There is sufficient evidence to show some of the peculiarities of Bach's habits of registering, from which we gather a few useful general principles. He must be credited with the possession of great judgment in the selection of stops best adapted to the character of the piece to be performed; he seems to have had skill in contrasting combinations arranged for different manuals; he delighted in novel tone effects; and he, like the German players of his day, seems to have preferred a pedal bass of full and decisive character, using pedal reeds at times when only flue work was employed on the manuals. Any attempt to reproduce Bach's manner of registering must be accompanied by a well-considered reference to the differences of wind-pressure, scale of pipes, and voicing. Griepenkerl, already so frequently quoted, gives some suggestions worthy of consideration, as coming from a thoughtful writer, acquainted with organs of the Bach period, and in possession of considerable traditional and circumstantial information concerning the great composer of organ music. He now speaks of the Pastorale in F, which consists of several delicate movements, united, though perhaps not originally connected, into a sort of suite form. For the first movement the following stops are suggested:—Manual soft flue stops of 16, 8, and 4 feet; pedal stopped sub-bass 32 feet tone, with soft 16 and 8 feet stops. For the second movement soft registers of flute-like quality of 8 and 4 feet; for the third movement it is proposed to treat the upper part as a sort of violin melody, played by a diapason stop on the great organ, and accompanied on the choir by a stopped or soft open of 8 feet pitch, of course; and the last movement is to be played on the great with flue work of 16, 8, and 4 feet. These combinations suggest ideas of quiet, varied, yet sufficiently sedate tone-colour, and yet seem to leave open a door for really fanciful treatment of Bach's softer pieces. In dealing with another and grander class of composition, the same writer has suggestions of value to make. The fine prelude in E flat, which Mendelssohn and Schumann delighted in, but which is still a rather neglected work, is thus suggestively dealt with by Prof. Griepenkerl. He proposes to prepare the different organs thus: Great all 16, 8, and 4 stops, to secure a broad, massive tone, but without the vulgar presence of reeds and mixtures; the upper manual (Oberwerk), or our swell, 8 and 4 feet stops; the back-positive or choir, with several 8 and 4 feet stops to secure a somewhat more distinct body of tone than that of the upper manual; the pedal, all 32, 16, and 8 feet, including 16 feet trombone, and even 32 feet reed, if a good one, but no 8 feet trumpet or mixtures. The longer passages are directed to be played on the great organ; the short piano sentences on the swell or upper manual, and the repetitions of these sentences in forte medium to be enunciated on the choir. In the great Toccata in F, the pedal figures extending above the D were not heard in all their stateliness by the composer, and are even now not to be properly rendered on most German organs by reason of limited compass, Griepenkerl suggests for the manual only 8 and 4 feet stops. Though, according to orthodox views, this work cannot be said to present opportunities for stop or manual changes, for recital purposes some little additional variety can be imparted to it, by playing the full staccato chords on the great and swell alternately, both beginning and ending—the figure being presented seven times—on the great. This antiphonal effect is not contrary to the spirit of the music; though perhaps it might be supposed to detract somewhat from its accumulative power. Such a reading would imply a fuller combination on the great than that just named, a fairly powerful selection of stops on the swell, and the manuals coupled so as to secure through the alternations a decided identity in tone quality. For the fugue a dignified and somewhat full combination on the great organ is rightly deemed necessary by the critic quoted. The Toccata in D minor, known as in the Doric mode, a distinction the details of the piece hardly justify, has manual changes marked by the composer, some of which are close and rapid. These are set out for the Oberwerk (swell) and Positive (choir); and from the context of the music it seems clear that these manuals should be fairly balanced in distinct but not too foreign tone properties, and the fugue should be given on a full but not noisy great organ combination. This beautiful Toccata seems clearly intended to be of a delicate but still by no means weak character, with a pedal part sufficiently in keeping. There is a traditional phrasing, by tying the two first and detaching the two last notes of the initial figure, which is, at least, interesting if not effective, and which would increase the charm of judiciously-chosen stop combinations. The Prelude in D minor, without pedal part, presents an undoubted opportunity for the display of diapason work, or even more delicate 8 feet tone. Those who would acquire a judicious knowledge of Bach's organic effects should lay aside the habit—now happily passing away—of regarding his music as chiefly "full organ" music, and study his works carefully, beginning with the sonatas, choral variations, and smaller pieces. All the soft effects of the organ should be exhaustively applied to the performance of these treasures of contrapuntal art, and the habit of such application will unfold to the organ student a wide knowledge of the best methods of rendering and utilising these works for recital purposes.

STORY OF THE OLD ORGAN IN THE CATHEDRAL "BEATÆ MARIÆ VIRGINIS," IN WOLFENBUTTEL.

I.

Written from information in existing documents by Selmar Muller, and translated by F. E. T.

The building of the Cathedral "Beatæ Mariæ Virginis," also called Mary Church, was begun in 1608, under the reign of Duke Henry Julius, who resided in the town of Wolfenbüttel. According to old records, the foundation stone was laid by Duke Julius August, Abbot of Blankenburg, and the building was completed in the year 1616. This, however, only refers to the Cathedral externally, for we find it described as unfinished in the year 1619, and are told that Duke Carl caused it to be completed in 1657.

The "Mary Chapel," or "Mary Church," formerly stood in the space now occupied by the small altar, and the large new church completely enclosed this chapel, without, however, disturbing the services held there, divine worship having been continued without interruption. In 1613 the roof was repaired, and two years later a chancel organ was procured for 54 thalers; a previous organ purchased in 1570 for 150 thalers, and restored in 1581 at a cost of 15 thalers, being then no longer required. This chancel organ must have been regarded as a makeshift, a large new organ being soon in prospect for the new church, and preparations to that effect seem to have been made in 1619. The records do not give the date when this old chapel was pulled down, but it would probably be done about the time when the chancel was completed and the new organ painted and decorated, that is to say from 1621 to 1622.

The age of the old Mary Chapel cannot be ascertained with any certainty, but, from external evidence, it must have been in existence about 60 years. There is no mention of an organ earlier than the one already referred to as purchased in 1570, and this could hardly have been a new instrument, seeing that it needed the services of a restorer in 1581, and was quite unusable in 1615, when it gave place to the little chancel organ.

An old register gives the names of organists who took duty at the chapel as follows :—

1. Bernhardus, 1573.
2. Johann Pedell, 1578 to 1584.
3. Johann Gorpius, 1584 to 1586.
4. Frantz Algermann the younger, 1598 to 1603.
5. Christopher Selle, 1603 to 1623.

The gap between 1586 and 1596 is only to be explained by the supposition that as Algermann is described "the younger," there was probably an older organist of the same name who officiated during these missing years. The family name of the first organist has not been ascertained, or the duration of his office. However, we know what is more important, the name of the first organist at the Cathedral. This was Christopher Selle, who appears to have gone from the Mary Chapel to the Cathedral as soon as the large new organ was finished and ready for use, in 1621. He also saw the organ in the process of building, but whether he took any part in drawing up the specification is unfortunately not known, as his name nowhere appears in connection with it.

There is no mention of the organ in the Cathedral registers earlier than 1726, the first century of its existence being entirely without any record until the organ was restored in the year above-named, when the following memoranda were discovered written on different parts of the instrument itself:—

1. This work was begun by H. Gottfried Fritzen, of Dresen, in 1620, and finished by him in 1623.

2. In the year 1638, I, Jonas Weigel, organ builder, of Brunswick, restored this organ, and finished it on July 30th, 1638.

3. This organ was restored throughout in 1695, and new stops added as follows:—Trombone, 16 feet; trumpet, 8 feet; cornet, 2 feet; hautboy and waldflöt, by Johann Mosengel, organ-builder, of Hanover.

"FALSE RELATIONS."

PART III.

In a paper on "Some Practical Bearings of Acoustics on Music as an Art" I had the honour to read before the Musical Association, on the 5th March, in the year 1883, special reference was made to the subject now being discussed. As the opinions then expressed have, by experience, been strengthened, I must ask the indulgence of any who heard, or have read, what I then said, if I quote from that paper what is applicable to the present occasion. Reference was made to the very able lecture by Dr. Gladstone on the "Relationship of Triads," which had previously been given to the members of this College in these words: "What appears to be the main principle deducible from that lecture is the belief in some bond of union or relationship between chords, whether they are consonant or dissonant, in order to establish a satisfactory connection between the several harmonies. This may be attained by a common note or notes, or by derivation from the same or relative roots. It will not be inappropriate to suggest a few thoughts from a different point of view upon one or two subjects as a supplement to the very able exposition of his opinions. To abandon entirely a recognition of the influence of the tetrachords in harmony, and scale formation, would be a serious loss if considered upon the following principle :—

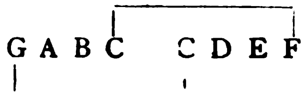
or by inverting the tetrachords :



by which it is seen that the dominant bears the same relationship to the upper tetrachord as the tonic does to the lower; and the sub-dominant has the same relative position in the lower tetrachord as the tonic takes in the upper. These three principal points are the only ones bearing major triads in the major mode. This is suggestive of thought in another direction, into which it is not desirable to be enticed. Taking these three principal chords of the key, that is, the tonic, dominant, and sub-dominant, and arranging them in the following order: dominant, tonic, and sub-dominant, the roots progress by equal skips from dominant to tonic, and then to sub-dominant; passing through the tonic as a central point between two extremes. A return to the tonic harmony would be required to attain a satisfactory sense of repose, without a departure from the key. When the same chords are arranged in this way:—sub-dominant, dominant and tonic, the harmonies vibrate, as it were, from one extreme to the other, passing over the tonic harmony, to which mental reference is made. This is proved by the necessity to revert to the tonic harmony, after the first two chords to satisfy the ear." Here then is a proof of the non-relationship of the tritone, because of this passing over the mutually connecting harmony between the chords. "This view is somewhat strengthened by the fact that the second inversion of the dominant triad may be followed by the second inversion of the sub-dominant. This is the only case in which one second inversion may follow another. Having attempted to justify the juxtaposition of the dominant and sub-dominant chords, the difficulty in the harmonisation of the scale is removed. If the usual formula is adopted in harmonising it in the upper part, it may be observed that the chords of the dominant and sub-dominant are each used twice, while that of the tonic occurs three times. From this it will be gathered that I do not regard the sub-dominant harmony as being disturbing, but rather that the tonic harmony is balanced on either side by the dominant and sub-dominant harmonies."

In this way an effort has been made to justify the succession of sub-dominant and dominant chords when followed by the harmony of the tonic, when approaching a cadence. It is advisable that such a succession of chords should not be freely used except for cadential purposes, because of the suggestion of completeness of harmony, embracing, as they do, all the several grades of the scale of the key.

Perhaps too much is assumed if it is thought that in this way a show of reason is given for accepting the conjunction of sub-dominant and dominant harmonies in approaching a full close, as being excellent in effect, justifiable by reason, and imparting a complete and satisfying character to a full cadence, which no other combination of chords could give. That it is a form of full close which has been justified by long use, is seen by reference to bars 9, 10, 11, 12 of the "Te Deum" in Tallis's famous service.

There are, however, other positions in which the tritone cannot be avoided which will now be considered. When chords appear in their first inversion, their equivocal nature was also alluded to and exhibited in the following passage, which I will, with your permission, quote from the paper from which the former extract was made :—

"The acceptable nature of a succession of chords of the sixth and third descending through the scale may, perhaps, be accounted for, although apparently lacking any affinity, because they are, seemingly, derived from roots next adjacent to each other, and no common note is apparent between the successive harmonies. The following series of chords of sixths, with accompanying thirds in the key of C major, will serve to illustrate this:—

I	II	III	IV	V	VI	VII	VIII	IX
F	E	D	C	B	A	G	F	E
6	6	6	6	6	6	6	6	6
3	3	3	3	3	3	3	4	6

It will be readily admitted that the root of the first chord, when followed by the tonic, may be the dominant. The third of these chords may be either a second inversion of the chord of the dominant seventh, or the third inversion of a chord of a minor ninth on E, omitting the root and third. When followed by the inversion of the chord of the sub-mediant, the ear may recognise the ambiguity of the third chord as a justification for the succession. To proceed further to the first inversion of the dominant triad, the fourth chord may be the third inversion of a super-tonic ninth, omitting the root and third, thus again justifying the progression to the inversion of the dominant triad by the ambiguity of the previous chord. The possibility of the sixth chord being an inversion of the chord of the dominant eleventh, followed by the chord of the thirteenth, and again by an inversion of the chord of the seventh upon the same root, follows from what has been said. The roots may then, perhaps, be as shown in the under stave."

These ideas have been adduced to prove the ambiguity of the nature of chords, whether consonant or dissonant. An ambiguity as to the nature of discords is frequently felt and acknowledged, and their etymology—to use a metaphor—is determined by their resolution. It is manifest, then, that a comprehensive and familiar knowledge of harmonic derivation in all its bearings will open up a large field for new combinations with proper relationships, and give much freedom and confidence to the musical artist in handling new harmonic combinations."

On a careful examination of the possible roots of the foregoing example of a succession of sixths, the inverted minor chords of the key are shown to be equivocal in their derivation and also the sub-dominant, while the tonic and dominant are unalterable. This gives a ready means of harmonising with good effect and justifiable propriety such awkward positions as are to be seen in the example already quoted from Fux.

According to the old rule of the octave a chord of the "added sixth" was placed upon the sub-dominant in ascending. This is now known as an inversion of the chord of the eleventh, or a chord of a double root, according to various theories. In one case the dominant is taken as the root, in the other the dominant and super-tonic are considered as the double roots. Either system regards the sub-dominant and sub-mediant of the scale as being the seventh and ninth of the dominant harmony and the super-tonic as the fifth, so that the resolution into the dominant harmony is really into a chord derived from the same root. If the fifth from the lowest note is omitted this must be equally true, although the chord appears to be an inversion of the super-tonic triad. Again, if the sixth is omitted, leaving the chord apparently the triad of the sub-dominant, how can it be proved they are not derived from the same root still, and are respectively the seventh, ninth, and eleventh of a fundamental discord derived from the dominant, when followed by the dominant harmony? Still further, if the sixth and fifth are both omitted, may not the same argument be true? Perhaps it may be urged that, as the sub-mediant is only a minor tone above the dominant in the natural scale, it cannot be the ninth of a chord derived from the dominant. In reply to this objection, with the equivocation of temperament the ear accepts a note slightly differing in pitch for what it is intended, according to the context of the harmony. From the foregoing remarks an argument may be deduced to justify the modern infraction of the rule against the false relationship of the tritone, in the case of the dominant harmony succeeding the sub-dominant, which are of frequent occurrence in modern music, and in which that false relationship is very palpably present. The ambiguity of the derivation of the sub-dominant harmony with such a context may be recognised by the ear, and the derivation of the sub-dominat and dominant chords may be assigned by it to the dominant as a common root. Two arguments have been exhibited on this subject, either of which appear to be forcible.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

On Tuesday last, Dr. F. J. Sawyer, F.C.O., read an excellent paper on "The primary principles of keyboard fingering." He traced the history of fingering from the Bach period, giving many interesting particulars, and offered valuable remarks upon modern playing technicalities, and upon the distinctions between pianoforte and organ fingering. Mr. E. H. Turpin occupied the chair.

RECITAL NEWS.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.—M. Eugene Gigout gave a fine performance on Saturday last; playing: Sonata No. 3 and Finale No. 1, Mendelssohn; Andante, Boely; Elevation, L. Boellmann; Toccata, Dubois, encored; Fugue in D, Bach; Communion, Gigout, an effective piece; Finale, third Concerto, Handel; Improvisation on "Men of Harlech;" Triumphal Chorus, Capocci. The vocalists were Mrs. Braham and Mr. H. Plunket Greene, a promising bass. To-night Mr. E. H. Lemare will play the last recital of the season.

The programme for the recently given third organ recital at the First Presbyterian Church, New York, comprised Bach's "Giant," fugue in D minor, the "Cantilene Nuptiale," and "Marche des Rois Mages," by Dubois; Guilmant's allegretto in B minor, Lemaigre's scherzo in D major and other selections. Mr. Gerrit Smith was the organist, and Mrs. Gerritt Smith (soprano) sang "I will Extol Thee," from Costa's "Eli," and Gounod's "Light from Heaven." These recitals are free to the public, and attract large audiences

GLASGOW.—At Uddingston Parish Church the Inauguration of Organ took place on March 23rd. A recital was given by Dr. A. L. Peace, with hymns and anthems by the Church Choir (Mr. John Logie, conductor). Programme:—

Organ Solo, Overture to the Oratorio "Saul" ...	Handel.
Te Deum Laudamus	Dr. A. L. Peace.
Organ Solo, Andante, from the Symphony in E flat.	Haydn.
Organ Solo, Allegretto from the "Military Symphony"	,,
Organ Solo, (air) "Holsworthy Church Bells"	Dr. S. S. Wesley.
,, Choral Song and Fugue	Dr. S. S. Wesley.
Anthem, "Blessed be thou, Lord God,"	Kent.
Organ Solo, "Duet—Sonata" (C Major)	Weber.
Anthem, "A Day in Thy Courts"	Dr. G. A. Macfarren.
Organ Solo, Sinfonia per Organo (E minor and major)	Morandi.
Organ Solo, "Marche Certège" (La Reine de Saba)	Gounod.

SYNOPSIS OF THE ORGAN.

The Organ, which has been built by Messrs. Forster and Andrews, Hull, consists of three manuals, from C C to G, and a separate pedal organ, C C C to F.

ST. NEVINGTON CHURCH, NEAR WIGAN.—An organ recital was given on Easter Sunday, in the afternoon, by Mr. Stubbs, A.C.O., deputy organist of Wigan Parish Church. Programme:—

Pastorale, in F	Merkel.
Chorus "Sing unto God"	Horsley.
Cavatina	Raff.
Postlude (Prelude and Fugue in C minor)	Hesse.
Evening Prayer	Smart.
Chorus, Hallelujah	Handel.

NEW YORK.—At Mr. Samuel P. Warren's 118th organ recital in Grace Church, March 22nd (18th of the present season), the following Bach programme was executed, and in a manner well-nigh inimitable, says an American paper. 1, Fantasia in G, book iv., No 11; 2, Trio Sonata No. 5, in E minor, Adagio, Andante, Un poco Allegro; 3, Toccata in F, book iii., No. 2; 4, Variations on the Choral, "Christ, Der Du bist der helle Tag"; 5, Choral Prelude, "Schmucke Dich, O, liebe Seele," book vii., No. 49; 6, Concerto in G, for violin, by Antonio Vivaldi, arranged for organ solo by Bach, book viii., No. 1, Vivace, Grave, Presto, of Passacaglia with Fugue in C minor.

Mr. James Loaring, F.C.O. gave a recital at St. Nicholas Cole-Abbey on April 3rd. The following was the programme:—Overture, "Sophonisba" (Paer), Andante with Variations, from No. 1 Symphony in C (Haydn), Organ Concerto, No. 5 (Handel), Andante in G (Loaring), Adagio, from the Quartet in G minor (Spohr), St. Ann's Fugue (Bach), March Cortège (Loaring).

At Canterbury Cathedral, on Easter Tuesday, a special service was held, when Mendelssohn's 114th Psalm and Handel's "Messiah," third part, were exceedingly well rendered by the Cathedral choir, augmented by the auxiliary volunteer choir and band of 18 performers. Dr. Longhurst conducted with his usual tact and experience.

TRURO.—The third "Service of Praise" at Truro Cathedral, was given on the 9th, at 8 p.m. when an enormous congregation assembled to hear Dr. Stainer's Cantata, "The Daughter of Jairus." The cathedral choir was augmented by some of the leading tenors and basses of the city. The soloists were, treble, Master F. Thomas; tenor Mr. A. Thomas; bass, Rev. A. V. Thornton. Mr. G. R. Sinclair ably presided at the organ, and the excellent conductor was Mr. T. S. Kendall, B.A., Cambridge, who has recently been appointed organist and choir director of the parish church at Bodmin, Cornwall. The choruses were well rendered, and with regard to the solos, all did extremely well. Still the singing of Master F. Thomas calls for special mention, as does also the rendering of the beautiful duet "Love Divine."

ST. STEPHEN'S, LEWISHAM.—The second Sunday after Easter in each year is observed as the Dedication Festival at this church, and the occasion is always taken advantage of for the rendering of special music. On Sunday last the church was very handsomely decorated with choice flowers. In the morning, at 11.45, Dr. Warwick Jordan's fine Communion Service in E was admirably rendered by the choir of the church—about 40 in number. Additional accompaniments of trumpets (principal, Mr. Walter Morrow), trombone, and drums (Mr. Horton) were used with great effect. At the evening service, Dr. Boyce's anthem, "I have surely built Thee an house," was sung, and at the conclusion Dr. Warwick Jordan's Festival Te Deum (reviewed recently in the MUSICAL WORLD) with the advantage of the same additional accompaniments as in the morning. There is no doubt that the judicious use of these instruments is of great help and effect, and their introduction into church services is very much on the increase.

ST. GEORGE'S, PERRY HILL.—An organ recital of exceptional character and merit was given by Dr. Warwick Jordan (F.C.O., organist and director of St. Stephen's, Lewisham) on April 4. The selections included "Allegretto Pastorale," from Dr. Jordan's own pen. The following excerpts followed, the vocal items being sung with due religious feeling and in a truly artistic manner by Mr. Alfred Pinnington: "My hope is in the everlasting" (Dr. Stainer); Allegro, Andante, Fugue (Brosig); Andante Grazioso (Mozart); "Come unto me" (Coenan); Intermezzo (Chipp); "Waft her Angels" (Handel); Finale, "Schiller-March" (Meyerbeer).

THE CITY TEMPLE.—An admirably rendered selection was given on April 19th, the 234th concert, by Mons. Eugene Gigout, the eminent organist of St. Augustin, Paris, whose solos were:—

Sonata in F.	Mendelssohn
Andante	Edmund H. Turpin
Offertoire (on Christmas Hymns)	L. Boellmann
Piece (in G minor)	A. P. F. Boely
Marche Funebre	Eugene Gigout
Toccata	Th. Dubois
Improvisation
Toccata in F (with solo for pedals)	J. S. Bach

Notes.

The new concert organ, which will contain some 3,500 speaking pipes, for the Philharmonic Hall in Berlin, is to be worked on an electro-pneumatic system. There will be a movable console, which will be connected to the instrument by a cable about 46 feet in length, containing 350 wires.

ST. PETER'S, REGENT SQUARE, W.C.—A Musical Festival was held in this church on April 10th. The performance consisted of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," rendered by Mr. Winter's Choral Society, Spohr's "As pants the hart," and "Hallelujah, Christ is risen," Callow. The symphony and accompaniments were played by the organist of the church, Mr. Duncan Callow, and Mr. G. D. Winter conducted the "Lobgesang." There was a good attendance.

At a meeting of organists, choirmasters, and others held at the City Temple, recently, under the presidency of Mr. Minshall, it was resolved to form a Nonconformist Choir Union, for the purpose of giving periodical festivals.

M. Guilmant's programme at his second Trocadero concert included Salomé's First Sonata, Handel's Eighth Organ Concerto, and the Overture to one of Bach's Cantatas played with the Colonne orchestra, besides several solo organ pieces, all of which were greatly appreciated.

Mr. Charles Haydn Arnold has been appointed organist and choirmaster to Killaloe Cathedral, near Limerick.

COLLOMPTON, DEVON.—Mr. H. J. Taylor, F.C.O., who for the past eighteen months has been officiating as organist and choirmaster of the Parish Church, Collompton, was last week the recipient of several gratifying presents from his friends in Collompton, on leaving the neighbourhood for his new appointment at Christ Church, Dover. From the members of the congregation he received a cheque with an illuminated address; from the church choir a beautiful floral album, containing photos of the members; from the Amateur Orchestral Society (of which Mr. Taylor was the founder) a large picture, mounted and framed, of the members of the Society in a group; and from the Collompton branch of the Western Counties Musical Association, a splendidly illuminated address.

On May 3rd, at 8 o'clock, Dr. Stainer's cantata, "St. Mary Magdalene," will be performed at the Parish Church, St. Mary Newington, Kennington Park Road, S.E., under the direction of Mr. W. Rayment Kirby, F.C.O., organist and choirmaster. Mr. W. G. Wood, F.C.O. Professor of the Organ, R.A.M., will preside at the organ.

A contemporary observes concerning current dates, that on April 18th, George, Lord Jeffreys, the infamous Chancellor of England, died in the Tower of London, in 1689. That he possessed considerable legal ability cannot be doubted, and he was an admirable musician. It was he who decided the relative merits of two organs designed for the Temple Church by request of the Benchers. Jeffreys gave judgment in favour of a German, known as "Father Smith," whose instrument, greatly improved, is in use at the present day. The organ in St. Paul's was also built by him; of this instrument it is said, only a few pipes, if any, remain, these being possibly incorporated in the present organ. The judge lived to be an octogenarian, and Pennant says he saw at Acton an original portrait of him, taken in 1690, when 82, but as he died in the previous year, there must be some mistake. Mr. Blackmore, in his beautiful work, "Lorna Doone," gives a portrait of Jeffreys in an inimitable bit of that word-painting for which he is famous.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS' CALENDAR.

On Tuesday, the library will be opened from 7 to 10. May 22nd, Lecture; June 26th, Lecture by Dr. C. W. Pearce; July 17th, 18th, 19th, F.C.O. Examination; July 20th, Diploma Distribution; July 24th, 25th, 26th, A.C.O. Examination; July 27th, Diploma Distribution. Other arrangements and particulars will be duly announced.

ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS.

You are kindly requested to write for Ainsworth's "New Patent Organ Pedal Combination List." Ainsworth's "New Patent" is perfectly unique and may be combined easily with any Piano. It is the only one which may be safely combined with any Piano without deteriorating the instrument. Having put down at my works two engines and machinery of the most desirable kind, I am now supplying my goods at a price which enables every organist and organ student to have always ready for use in his Studio an

ORGAN PEDAL PIANO,

AFFORDING PERFECTLY UNIQUE PEDAL PRACTICE.

34, Sheen Park, Richmond.

DEAR SIR,—I have deferred writing to comment upon your Pedals and Action now attached to my pianoforte until I could satisfy myself of their utility and efficiency. I can now conscientiously say that they more than fulfil all my anticipations. Although I am no carpenter, aided by your lucid diagram I had little difficulty in attaching them myself, and it is impossible to over-estimate the comfort they give to me or to conceive the saving of time one experiences in one's own room.—Believe me, yours truly,

BURNHAM HORNER, F.R. Hist.S.

To Mr. Mr. Ainsworth.

DEAR SIR,—It gives me great pleasure to bear testimony to the perfection of your Invention. I am more than satisfied with your Patent Action and Organ Pedals, and consider them worth double the money. Organists and organ students who desire to improve in the Art of Pedalling, which is so essential to a good organist, will do well to procure a set. I have seen no Action half so effective, and one can sit at the Piano and play, "Fixed in his everlasting seat," or any other organ music, or organ arrangement with the greatest pleasure. The touch of pedals could not be better, and the action is as you say, "Absolutely free from annoyances." They cannot be too highly recommended, as by their use, rapid progress is certain.—Believe me, sincerely yours,

I. B. Thornton,
Organist, Birstall, Leeds.

Cologne, July 16th, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have much pleasure in informing you that your Pedals have given the fullest satisfaction. I have them combined with my practice Piano. Many of my musical friends who have seen them, as well as my organ pupils, are quite delighted with them; and I must acknowledge that I have never met with any Pedals so noiseless and pleasant to play upon as yours. The Action I consider durable, and of very good workmanship. Every organist who desires to perfect his playing will welcome your invention. I can recommend your goods in every respect.—Yours truly,

HERR J. RODENKIRCHEN.

To John Ainsworth, Esq. Organist, The Cathedral, Cologne, Germany.

TOOLS.—In order to facilite the attachment, a complete set of tools are sent (four in number) each one marked for its particular use. By the use of these tools, and following carefully the directions, ANY ONE can make a really good attachment.

On Receipt of Trade or Professional Card, you will receive List, with Liberal Terms.

LONDON: SATURDAY, APRIL 28, 1888.

MR. HERKOMER'S "THE SORCERESS."

The first performance of Mr. Herkomer's "The Sorceress," given on Tuesday, was, in a musical sense, even more satisfactory than the general rehearsal had led us to anticipate. The orchestra, under Mr. Carl Armbruster's direction, and with Mr. Deichmann as leader, played throughout with accuracy and refinement; and when one considers that most of the young ladies and gentlemen of the chorus did not even know their notes when they were set to this difficult task, their performance was little short of marvellous. Although occasionally the voices seemed a little rough, and the attack not always as energetic as could have been desired, their general performance was certainly much superior to the average of an Italian operatic chorus; especially taking into account that they continually moved about the stage, while the chorus at Covent Garden, as a rule, stand as still as if they were made of stone, staring at the conductor, instead of taking any part in the action. Of the solo singers, the young lady who sang the "Lullaby" displayed a sympathetic voice, and Mr. Herkomer's tenor in the Shepherd's Song proved to be of agreeable timbre, while music and words were throughout delivered with remarkable intelligence. Of Mr. Wehrschmidt, the troubadour, and the captain of the gipsies, we cannot speak in equally favourable terms, the gentleman first alluded to being, moreover, placed at a disadvantage by the part being too low for his voice; but slight blemishes of this kind count for little in a performance which included such admirable features as the two great gipsy choruses, acted and sung, as they were, with singular truth and vivacity. The ballad assigned to the Gipsy Queen was sung behind the scenes by Miss Pauline Cramer, who did full justice to it. Miss Griffiths, the representative of the heroine, although speechless, spoke volumes of beauty and artistic refinement, her attitudes being as graceful as they were, in the highest sense, dramatic. Of the beauty of the stage picture presented, as well as of the play and the music, we have already spoken at sufficient length to make further comment unnecessary. One thing, however, deserves still to be recorded in Mr. Herkomer's favour. During the performance the audience, in accordance with a request inserted in the programme, refrained from all applause, but at the end the enthusiasm waxed fast and furious. The audience remained in their seats for at least five minutes, clapping their hands and calling vociferously for the author. But that author was too wise to destroy the impression which his remarkable work had produced on the mind. The curtain remained inexorably closed. No author made his appearance and his bow, neither did the actors. By his modesty, Mr. Herkomer has set a shining example to all other theatres, Bayreuth included.

Correspondence.

NEW WINE IN OLD BOTTLES.

To the Editor of THE MUSICAL WORLD.

SIR,—For several reasons sincere lovers of music in England are just now watching the progress and policy of the Philharmonic Society with feelings of special interest, not to say anxiety. Not to mention the associations that cluster around this time-honoured institution, the good work it has done in the past, its many triumphs and vicissitudes, the temporary loss of its representative character owing to causes intelligible enough to all but those who dwelt within the charmed circle of its conservative influence, and its still more recent rehabilitation, there is another fact which would alone be sufficient to place it in an unique position among similar bodies in this county. For in the Philharmonic Society we have the nearest approach to be found in England to the system of subventioned concerts, so prevalent on the continent: an influential array of guarantors occupying, as far as possible, the place of a government which, grandmotherly as it can be on occasions, is well-known to be niggardly in the matter of disbursements where questions of art are concerned. Now it is manifest that support of this kind, whether extended privately, as in the present instance, or officially, as in the cases of concerts given at Paris by Pasdeloup, Lamoureux, and others, must owe its origin to some incentive over and above mere affection for individual artists, or sentimental regard for a particular institution.

Blest with a partial immunity from loss, and with a backbone of capital supplied by others, organisations so placed have with their special privileges certain duties and responsibilities, the due fulfilment of which may be not only expected, but fairly demanded of them. Foremost among these is that of presenting in its most dignified aspect the art of which they are, in a sense, accredited representatives; of eschewing claptrap, and resisting all temptation to increase their store by meretricious attractions, such as may be forgiven to managers whose avowed business it is to trim their sails with each passing wind of fashion, and put as much money in their purses as they can. Let us not underrate the efforts of the Philharmonic Society to fulfil what may be fairly called their mission, as evidenced by their invitations to such eminent musicians as Tchaikowsky, Widor, and, next Thursday, Edward Grieg. But it is impossible to withhold attention from another side of the picture. Twice have the Philharmonic concerts been turned into a prodigy show; last year on the advent of little Hofmann, and very lately in honour of the little Hegner. I have nothing to do here with the merits of either of these infant phenomena, or with the question whether it is desirable under any circumstances to accord to immature talent, or genius, or whatever it may turn out to be, a place upon the concert platform. One thing is very certain: the august and formerly exclusive Philharmonic is not the place. By what motive was the crowd of society ladies and gentlemen, who seldom care to set foot in a concert room devoted to serious art, induced to reinforce the habitual frequenters of these entertainments on Thursday last week? Was it to hear the new music of an eminent French composer, or to level opera glasses at a child pianist on a high stool, whose performance, promising and remarkable as it was, would have certainly been inadequate to obtain for an adult an engagement in the same place on the strength of its intrinsic merit? Unfortunately, there can be no difficulty in answering this question. The notable change that came o'er the spirit of the scene when one of Society's most diminutive lions made his appearance upon it; the sudden rustle and flutter that occurred on his entrance; the eager rising on tip-toe to catch a last glimpse of him as he made his final bow—all this was sufficient to prove that for many who were present that night the attraction was not music so much as what has been recently termed in your columns "the visual aspect of virtuosity," that virtuosity in the present case being in a great measure rather potential than actual. No doubt precedents, especially in the musical art, are not wanting where this public exhibition of precocious gifts has been so far justified by the result that the patrons—individual or corporate—who were first instrumental in bringing their "prodigies" to notice have had reason in after years to plume themselves upon their perspicacity. The names of Mozart, Liszt, Joachim, and very many others will immediately occur to your musical readers; and not only in music, but in other arts, and in science, too, there does seem to be some warrant for the belief that precocity and genius often go together. Stuart Mill read Greek when he was six. Cimabue, the early Florentine painter, and founder of what is generally called the pre-Raphaelite school, discovered Giotto, his successor and a greater than himself, as a little shepherd boy in the fields, drawing sheep and other objects in his childish way. But reverting to infants exposed to the wear and tear of public life for the delectation of wondermongers, a thought has also to be given to those among them whose lives were probably shortened by the too early strain upon their energies, and to the still sadder cases where premature decay of powers, or early death has been the result. As far, therefore as concerns any honour which a high class musical society may expect to gain for itself in the future by figuring in the present as the patron of phenomenal children, it is a speculation, a speculation unworthy, I contend, of the Philharmonic Society, and altogether inconsistent with their duties towards that art they are supposed to represent. Formerly this Society erred and suffered by a too exclusive devotion to the old. Now they are not above adding to their cash receipts by the exhibition of the crude. But appetite for the marvellous has a habit of growing, and who shall say to what lengths their present objectionable policy may eventually lead them? In an American paper, for instance, I read, a little time ago, that since the attraction of marvellous children began to fall off, there was a brisk inquiry for centenarian pianists. Is it within the bounds of possibility that in course of time we may be asked to transfer our attentions also to the decrepid? We hope for better things, but, meanwhile, let the Philharmonic Society take to heart a certain warning against "putting new wine into old bottles," and leave the trade of musical baby-farming to less responsible caterers.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
CLASSICUS.

ST. ANDREWS UNIVERSITY AND MUSICAL DEGREES.

To the Editor of THE MUSICAL WORLD.

SIR,—Is the degree of Mus. Doc., St. Andrews, Fife, N.B., not worth the calling for? So it would appear; for, at the graduation ceremonial held last week, the Doctor Designate from Edinburgh didn't turn up, although the distance between the two cities is rather less than a Sabbath day's journey. No trump card he! Putting a stop to the yelling of the bagpipes by tapping on the table with a hammer, the Chancellor steps majestically forward. All eyes are fixed upon him: the ceremonial is about to begin. "Ca' the ewes tae the knowes," are the words with which that august dignitary opens the proceedings, this being the Scotch for "call the Doctors Designate to receive their honorary degrees." "Saw ye Johnnie comin'?" interjects the anxious Alma Mater, alluding to the gentleman from Edinburgh who was to receive the degree of Mus. Doc. "He's owre the water tae Charlie" responds Black-rod. "I expeckit tae ha'e heard 'um play the 'East Neuk o' Fife,'" croaks a venerable Doctor of Divinity; "we never mak' a man Mus. Doc. unless he can dae that." "My heart is sair for somebody," sobs the aged Alma Mater, still thinking of her truant bairn. "Tuts, wummin, never fash yer beard aboot 'um," remonstrates the Principal, "he's owre the Border an' awa wi' Jock o' Hazledean, an' we'll jist ha'e tae confer the degree in absentia." But the heartsore Alma Mater refused to be comforted, and mournfully quavered forth—

There's nae luck aboot the hoose,
There's nae luck ava,
There's little pleesure in the hoose,
When oor Mus. Doc.'s awa.

The foregoing is an "Exercise" which I have composed for the degree of Mus. Doc., St. Andrews. It embodies what the Senatus of that University would term a "combination of melodies," i.e., counterpoint, in as many parts as there are dramatis personæ. If it is accepted, I shall be sure to let you know. I am, Sir, yours as ever, JOHN GREIG, Edinburgh, 23rd April, 1888. Queen's College, Oxford.

A CORRECTION.

To the Editor of THE MUSICAL WORLD.

DEAR SIR,—Will you allow me to correct what, in your account of the "S. Peter" performance at S. John's, Waterloo-road, on Sunday week, may have a misleading effect.

I believe we may claim to be second to S. Anne's, Soho, in the introduction of oratorio performances in London churches, having given such performances frequently during the past seven years.

One other correction. The organ is considered to be especially rich in diapason work (I quote from the authority of Messrs. E. H. Turpin, Edwin Bending, F. A. Docker, and other well-known organists), possessing but seven reed registers in proportion to 26 flue stops.—I am, dear sir, yours faithfully,

HENRY J. B. DART,
Organist S. John's, Waterloo-road

Concerts.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

Mr. Manns's annual benefit concert last Saturday proved, if proof were necessary, the great esteem and appreciation in which this excellent artist is held. For 31 years, Mr. Manns, by his unswerving devotion to the highest and best in music, and the skill which he has brought to bear upon his task of giving worthy interpretations of such music, has proved himself a conductor and musician of the very first rank, a fact to which the enthusiasm of Saturday's large audience abundantly testified. The main items in the programme were Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, three of Dvorak's "Slavonian Dances" op. 72, Mr. Hamish McCunn's clever orchestral ballad "The Ship o' the Fiend," and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, all played to well-nigh perfection. Quite a feature of the concert was the re-appearance of Herr Carl Formes, the veteran basso profundo, after an absence from England of 20 years. It cannot be said that Herr Formes possesses in the same degree the qualities which rendered him almost unique when in his prime, but he, nevertheless, at times emits notes of great power and sonority, and his lower register still is, as it ever has been, remarkable. In Sarastro's air from the "Zauberflöte" his intonation was uncertain, but he subsequently sang Marcel's celebrated war song, "Piff paff," from the "Huguenots" with great dramatic effect, winning great applause, which was redoubled on his singing "In sheltered vale," which is so intimately associated with his name, to his own accompaniment. Nikita's rendering of Mozart's "Deh viene" and the jewel song from "Faust" showed that she possesses a very pure voice and finished vocalisation. Surely these gifts are sufficient, and we must protest against the silly piece of stage effect in which she indulged when singing "The last rose of summer" as an encore, viz., pulling a rose to pieces and strewing the petals on the floor. Mdle. Carlotta Recoschéwicz, in "Ach, mein Sohn," from the "Prophète," displayed a fine voice, albeit hard in the upper register. Herr. Hans Wessely played a "Ballade and Polonaise," by Vieuxtemps, admirably, and considerably strengthened the impression made by his playing a fortnight previously, whilst Mr. Ernest Gillet, a new comer, evidenced good qualities in his rendering of Mr. Manns's paraphrase for 'cello and strings of Härtel's "Abendständchen."

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

According to the more or less optimistic view that may be taken of the matter, the exceptionally crowded state of St. James's Hall at the Philharmonic Society's concert given on Thursday, last week, may be attributed either to the presence of one of the most eminent of contemporary French composers, or to the announced début at these concerts of by no means the least remarkable of recent youthful prodigies. Taking these two events, however, in the indisputable order of their importance, priority must naturally be given to M. Charles Widor's orchestral work, entitled "A Walpurgis Night," written expressly for the occasion, and conducted by the composer in person. This consists of three numbers, and the first and last—representing respectively a sort of wild hunt, and an equally demoniacal dance, each preceded by a short adagio—may be considered together, both conjuring up, as they do, a wild picture of the Brocken, with its weird and lurid accessories. The composer has, in some measure, been handicapped in the subject he has chosen, by the fact that much of the material to which he has been compelled to have recourse for his terrific effects has been anticipated by Wagner, Boito, Liszt, and others. In his employment of this material, however, he has not failed to leave the impress of an originality which makes itself unmistakeably felt in many a startling phrase, and many an effective and highly descriptive orchestral combination. There can be no possible objection to a composer choosing for the basis of his work an idée philosophique générale, with other subsidiary themes and "notes," and deriving his inspiration therefrom, provided the hearer be permitted to receive impressions in his own way, and to consider his imagination free to work in the direction which seems to his particular mind to be indicated by the music. A leit-motive is worth little when it has to be sought for, and when marked with sufficient clearness, as in the present case, it may be well left to assert its effect without elaborate explanation. Many will be content in these two movements, while borne along by the impetuous rush of sound, to indulge in a series of mental pictures suggested by the title of the work, and by memories of the great poem upon which it is founded. For the needful contrast, M. Widor, in the middle movement, has had recourse to the second part of Goethe's drama, entitled the "Classical Sabbath," where Helena appears to Paris. This may fairly be characterised as the gem of the work—a delightfully sustained flow of melodic thought, evidencing familiarity with many of those inner secrets of harmony, orchestral colouring, and polyphonic writing, upon which the subtle charm to be found only in the music of some few of the foremost composers of latter days, may be said in a great measure to depend. Young Hegner, the boy pianist, chose for the display of his talents, Field's allegro in A flat for pianoforte and orchestra—a pleasantly melodious, but at times rather tedious, example of that composer; the better known Etude, in A flat, of Chopin, and Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo Capriccioso. Though not quite at his best, he again showed powers of executing and phrasing, which, considering the conditions of the performance, were certainly remarkable. The concert opened with a piece of considerable interest, G. A. Macfarren's overture to "Romeo and Juliet," the existence of which can be traced as far back as January, 1837, as may be seen by reference to the MUSICAL WORLD, issued on the 6th of that month, and was followed by a well-written and effective scena, written by Mr. Ebenezer Prout, and sung by Miss Hilda Wilson. Worthy performances of Beethoven's Symphony in A, and the overture to "Der Freyschütz," completed an exceptionally liberal programme. Mr. Cowen conducted with his accustomed ability.

MISCELLANEOUS.

In aid of the Bishop of Bedford's "East London Church Fund," Farmer's "Christ and His Soldiers" was performed in the St. John-at-Hackney Grammar School, Clapton, on Tuesday evening, the 17th, by the choir boys of the school, assisted by the choir of St. Andrew Undershaft, E.C., and other friends, in all over 50 voices. The lady soloists were Miss Lavinia Walker (soprano) and Mrs. Crossley (contralto); Mrs. Wallis (pianoforte) and Mr. J. H. Wait (American organ) assisted, and Mr. W. M. Wait (organist, etc., St. Andrew Undershaft, E.C., and choirmaster at Grammar School) conducted. There was a large audience, and the Bishop of Bedford (Dr. W. Walsham How) and several clergy were present.

The Erith Choral Society gave an excellent rendering of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," on the 18th, in the Public Hall, the soloists being Miss Ada Beck, Miss Lottie West, Mr. Laurence Fryer, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail; leader of the band, Mr. Halfpenny; pianoforte, Mr. Sidney Naylor; harmonium, Mr. F. Squires, F.C.O. Miss Ada Beck gave an artistic rendering of "Hear ye, Israel," Miss Lottie West sang with much expression "Woe unto them," and "O, rest in the Lord," Mr. Laurence Fryer was much applauded for "Then shall the righteous," and Mr. Tufnail for "Is not His word? &c." The choir and band did full justice to their conductor, Mr. Richard Lemaire, and there was a fairly large and very appreciative audience.

On Wednesday, the 18th April, the Hurstpierpoint Choral Society gave their last concert of the season, under the conductorship of Mr. F. J. Karn, Mus. Bac. Cantab. The work performed was Handel's "Acis and Galatea," the soloists being Mrs. Duncan Pearce (Galatea), Mr. Evan Cox, tenor in Chichester Cathedral (Acis), and Rev. J. H. Bebbington (Polyphemus). There was a small band of strings led by Stephano Khardys, and pianoforte ably played by Miss White to accompany the Serenata. All the soloists were successful. Galatea specially distinguished herself in "As when the dove." Mr. Evan Cox has an excellent tenor voice of light and pure quality, and his rendering of "Love sounds the alarm" was good. The Rev. J. H. Bebbington (Polyphemus) gave an excellent rendering of "O ruddier than the cherry." The "chorus" did their work capitally, especially the difficult "Wretched lovers." The second part of the programme consisted of songs, etc., and a special feature was the violin playing of Stephano Khardys, a pupil of Mr. F. J. Karn, who played De Beriot's "Scène de Ballet" wonderfully well, considering he is only 14 years old. A song of his composition, called "Watch and wait" was delightfully sung by Mr. Evan Cox, and both composer and singer were recalled.

The Woodside Park Musical Society terminated their season with a performance of the late Sir. G. A. Macfarren's cantata, "The Lady of the Lake," on Thursday, the 19th, at the Woodside Hall, Woodside Park. The work received a careful rendering under the direction of Mr. Alfred J. Dye, and was much appreciated by a large audience. A professional orchestra, consisting of strings, wood, wind, and harp, ably led by Mr. E. Halfpenny, greatly added to the effect of the cantata. The soloists were Miss Eveleen Carlton, Miss Damian, Mr. Percy Palmer, Mr. T. R. Johnson, and Mr. A. L. Reynolds.

On the 23rd inst., M. Guillaume Frank appeared for the first time as a violinist and composer at Steinway Hall. M. Frank's chief effort was Beethoven's Sonata for violin and pianoforte in F major. His tone is rather harsh, which may be partly the fault of his violin, but he hardly possesses at present that breadth of style which is so imperatively demanded in the performance of Beethoven; he appeared to much greater advantage in several lighter pieces, principally of the French school. Of the songs and violin music from his pen introduced at the concert under notice, although it cannot be said that they possess any marked degree of originality, they are nevertheless pleasing and well written, and were favourably received. Vocal selections were contributed by Mdlles. Carlotta Badia and Margaret Serruys, and Mrs. M. A. Carlisle; Mr. E. J. Hambleton played on the 'cello, and Mr. Wilhelm Ganz accompanied.

Mr. Aguilar's pianoforte pupils gave a concert at the Portman Rooms, on Friday, April 20th. Mr. Aguilar himself played the Allegro and Fugue from 2nd Suite (Handel), and two pieces by Chopin; the rest of the interesting programme was rendered admirably by the ladies and gentlemen who have been trained by Mr. Aguilar: Mr. Algernon H. Lindo, in Chopin's A flat Ballade; Miss Maude Helyar, in Moszkowski's Polonaise; Mr. F. Peachey, Jun., in Liszt's Rhapsodie Hongroise in F; and Mrs. D'Iffanger, in Mr. Aguilar's Dream, and Scharwenka's Valse Impromptu being especially successful.

Madame Cornelia Dalnoky, from the Imperial Court Theatre of Vienna, gave a Grand Morning Concert on Thursday, April 19, at Mrs. Hungerford Mackay's residence, 7, Buckingham Gate, S.W. Madame Dalnoky possesses a fine voice of extensive compass and great power, but it is a voice that has been adapted by nature and art for the stage, rather than for the concert room. She was assisted by Mr. René Ortmans, a young violinist of great ability; by M. Abranoff, a basso of excellent quality, from the Imperial Court Theatre, St. Petersburg, and by Mdlle. Dufour, Madame Schlüter, Miss Rachel Phelps (harp), Mr. Egbert Roberts, Signor Rizzelli, and Mr. Fitzroy Sheridan. The second part of the concert consisted of the third act of Gounod's "Faust," Madame Dalnoky taking the Marguerite music. Mr. Wilhelm Ganz and Signor Carlo Ducci conducted.

MR. MAPLESON'S BANKRUPTCY.

A first meeting has been held under the failure of James Henry Mapleson, described as an operatic manager, late of the Royal Italian Opera House, Covent Garden, and Her Majesty's Theatre, Haymarket. The receiving order was made on January 27 last, on the petition of Mr. Donald M'Gregor, of the Royal Hotel, Edinburgh, and the debtor's statement showed liabilities expected to rank £40,100, with assets nil. Mr. Mapleson attributed his failure mainly to the non-completion of a scheme for the erection of the National Opera House on the Victoria Embankment, by which he stated that he lost about £30,000, and he explained the residue of the deficiency by depreciation in the value of his theatrical properties as estimated for realization, also by loss on his last London operatic season.

Mr. Gole, solicitor, appeared for the debtor; and Mr. Rubinstein, Mr. Roscoe, and Mr. W. A. Colyer for creditors.

Proofs amounting to £34,345 having been adjusted, the debtor was briefly examined, and stated that he had given cheques in payment of a portion of the amount due to the petitioning creditor, and some of them were dishonoured. He also dishonoured a bill of exchange. He was sued, and paid a portion of the amount of the bill. Speaking generally, he had been unfortunate since his undertaking of the National Opera House. Last season he had also the misfortune to lose the services of Madame Patti.

Mr. Gole submitted a scheme by which it was proposed that the sum of £500 should be provided for the benefit of the creditors, subject to the payment of costs and preferential debts, and that claims to the amount of £25,000 should be withdrawn, and the receiving order rescinded upon the approval of the scheme by the Court. He explained that the offer was only made with the assistance of friends, as the debtor had no means whatever of his own. He was naturally desirous of obtaining his release, as he had been before the public for a long time, and hoped that his future exertions might be attended with more success.

The Assistant Receiver remarked that as there appeared to be no assets, the offer, though small, was better than nothing, and it would be for the Court to say whether the scheme ought to be confirmed. There should be at least £400 out of the £500 available for creditors after payment of costs and preferential claims.

Mr. Rubinstein said the misfortunes which had befallen the debtor entitled him to the sympathy of his creditors. He moved the acceptance of the proposal.

Some discussion followed, and eventually resolutions were passed accepting the proposed scheme.

FOREIGN.

BERLIN, April 20th.—On the 11th we had the first performance, at the Royal Opera, of Rehbaum's "Turandot." It is a comic opera, founded upon Gozzi's story. While Schiller, in his drama, improved upon the story by raising the tone of the characters, Rehbaum, who is his own librettist, deprives the characters of his play of all serious interest, working up the comic possibilities, and turns out a libretto of a somewhat trifling nature. Rehbaum is known to be a musician, but has not done himself justice in this work. Nevertheless the opera, as it stands, found admirers, and won a fair success, the composer and the interpreters being recalled after each act. Fräulein Leisinger sang the title part, Herr Ernst, Kalaf, and Herr Krolop threw himself into the rather vulgarised character of Barak, to the delight of the "gods." Herren Schmidt, Oberhauser, and Fräulein Globig took minor parts.—Herr Franz Rummel has returned here after a successful concert tour in Belgium, and a trumphal performance in Cassell. Herr Lessmann has adapted to a popular tune, a hymn to the Emperor (words by Roth), which has been greatly appreciated by the public when sung by Frau Joachim at several concerts. The following is a list of the operatic composers and their works, who have been accorded a hearing in Berlin during 1887. In all 259 performances have been given: Wagner, 42 (Lohengrin 14. Walküre 9, Siegfried 8, Tannhäuser 6, Holländer 2, Tristan 2, Meistersinger 1); Nessler, 29 (Trompeter); Lortzing, 22 (Wildschütz 8, Undine 7, Zar und Zimmermann 6, Waffenschmied 1); Meyerbeer, 19 (Prophet 8, Afrikanerin 6, Huguenotten 3, Robert 2); Verdi, 18 (Aida 6, Rigoletto, Troubadour, Traviata, each 4); Bizet, 18 (Carmen); Mozart, 15 (Don Juan 12, Figaro 3); Flotow 13, (Martha 8, Stradella 5); Weber, 11 (Freischütz); Rüfer, 9 (Merlin); Auber, 9 (Fra Diavolo 6, Maurer 2, Masaniello 1); Donizetti, 9 (Regimentstochter); Gounod, 7 (Faust); Gluck, 6 (Betrogene Kadi 5, Armide 1); Nicolai, 6 (Merry Wives); Offenbach, 6 (Verlobung bei der Laterne); Joncières, 6 (Johann von Lothringen); Hofmann, 5 (Donna Diana); Beethoven, 4 (Fidelio): Rossini, 3 (Barbiere); Boieldieu, 2 (Weisse Dame). The Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung remarks that this list, as representative of the work done on the principal theatre of Germany, is one to be ashamed of. 'It points out that Rüfer's "Merlin" is the only novelty of the year, that a contemptible work like the "Trompeter von Säkkingen" was oftener played than any other opera of the repertoire, and that the names of only three living German composers appear in the list. This is enough to discourage native genius.

PROVINCIAL.

BATH.—On Monday evening a chamber concert (by permission of Sir George Grove) was given at the Assembly Rooms by Miss Zoe Pyne. The programme commenced with Schumann's Sonàta in A minor for pianoforte and violin, beautifully played by Miss Marian Osborn and Miss Pyne. Mr. Herbert Thorndike was recalled after his song, "Thou art passing hence, my brother" (Sullivan), which he gave with sympathetic feeling. Mr. William Squire, from the Royal College of Music, who appeared before the Bath public for the second time, chose for his solo on the violoncello a "Polonaise" by Popper, and by his clever interpretation obtained a recall, and Mdle. Agnes Janson gained a similar compliment for her song, "Caro mio bene," Giordani. Miss Marian Osborn, also a pupil of the Royal College of Music, played Liszt's arrangement of Bach's Fantasia and Fugue in G minor (the "Giant"), which, abounding in difficulties, afforded good scope for her brilliant execution, at the same time giving opportunity for delicacy of touch and expression. Her excellent rendering of the Fugue won her hearty applause. Mr. Herbert Thorndike's songs, a, "Once at the Angelus," Somervell, and b, "If thou art sleeping," Gounod, were greatly appreciated, and the latter re-demanded and given. Miss Pyne's violin solo "Rondo Capriccioso," Saint-Saëns, was well adapted to show her skilful manipulation of the instrument, and earned a well deserved encore. Her intonation is pure, and she plays with good expression and brilliant execution, and phrases well. Mdlle. Janson delighted the audience with two charming little songs by Massenet, "Le Crépuscule" and "Swedish Song," and in response to an enthusiastic encore gave the "Habanera" from "Carmen." Mr. Thorndike sang Addison's "Do I love thee?" in his usuul good style. A most enjoyable concert closed with Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor, capitally rendered by Miss Osborn, Miss Pyne, and Mr. Squire. Miss Zoe Pyne's earliest instruction on the violin was given by Mr. Allan Campbell; she was afterwards for a short time at the Paris Conservatoire, and then went to study under Mr. Henry Holmes at the Royal College of Music, where she was an "Exhibitioner." Miss Pyne is a sister of Mr. Kendrick Pyne of Manchester, and daughter of the esteemed organist of the Bath Abbey.

Facts and Comments.

Mr. Mackenzie will deliver his inaugural address at the Royal Academy this, Saturday, afternoon. We may state that Mr. Mackenzie himself will act as conductor of the Academy Concerts, and that he means to pay special attention to the training of chorus and orchestra. Mr. Burnett's appointment was, and was understood to be from the first, only temporary.

Mr. Santley has recovered from his recent indisposition, and anyone seeing him stride along Regent Street a few days ago, would have found it difficult to believe that he was not in the most perfect of healths. But Mr. Santley is one of those men who look always well, and who therefore get no pity when they feel very different from what they look. He has in reality been seriously ill, and is looking forward to a Mediterranean voyage to recoup his strength. The pity of it is that he will not be able to sing in "The Golden Legend" before the Queen on Tuesday, or indeed anywhere else between this and June.

Mr. Lloyd sailed for America in the Etruria on Saturday, personally conducted by his faithful friend and Achates, Mr. Vert. Amateurs will think this another serious loss for the season, although rising tenors will probably take a different view, and perhaps watch the progress of the Etruria across the Atlantic with mixed feelings. But a ship carrying our premier tenor is as safe as that which whilom carried the fortunes of Cæsar. If she were to go to the bottom, a dolphin would ascend from the deep, and on its back Mr. Lloyd, like a second Arion, would continue his voyage to the new world. Let us hope that the broad back of the musical fish would also provide accommodation for the excellent Mr. Vert.

Miss Gomes, by the way, was to have sailed the same day for Calcutta, but she was heard to warble that evening at the Musical Artists' Concert, and, for all we know, may still be amongst us.

The Examiners for the University of London Musical Degrees for 1888-89, are William Pole, Esq., Mus. Doc., F.R.S., and John Stainer, Esq., Mus. Doc., M.A.

The third performance of Mr. Herkomer's play "The Sorceress," was, on Thursday last week, chiefly set aside for "the profession." Amongst theatrical lights we saw Miss Ellen Terry, Mr. Thorne, Mr. Wyndham, Miss Mary Moore, Messrs. Toole, Edward Terry, etc. There were also a few musicians, Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, Mr. Barnby, and some others.

The memory of Walter Bache is, we are glad to learn, to be honoured by the establishment of a scholarship under his name, supplementary to the Liszt scholarship, in behalf of which Mr. Bache worked so earnestly. A fund therefore is being raised for the purpose; and a committee has been formed, with Mr. A. Littleton as hon. treasurer, and Mr. C. A. Barry as hon. secretary, who will receive subscriptions.

Mr. Walter Bache had much valuable music in his library such as the score and orchestral parts of the Dante symphony, and others of Liszt's works. It is likely that a certain number of volumes and MSS., after being duly catalogued, will be placed in the hands of Messrs. Lucas & Weber, for purposes of reference, or possibly, we hope, for use when occasion offers.

The Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford was crowded with a fashionable audience, on the occasion of a concert last week, at which all the performers were ladies. The only gentleman on the platform was the conductor (the Rev. E. H. Moberly), and the "ladies' string orchestra" included thirty-six violins, ten violas, eighteen violoncellos, and two double basses. The concert was in aid of the "Sarah Acland Surgical and Medical Home," Oxford, and was a brilliant success.

A Russian National Opera Company from Moscow is to appear next month in Berlin, after which it will make a tour through Germany and France, and the United States, taking London next spring on the homeward journey. This company consists of twenty soloists from the Court Theatres of Moscow and St. Petersburg, and a chorus of fifty voices.

The Royal Musical Institute of Florence has nominated Sir Arthur Sullivan one of its corresponding members, together with Tschaikowsky, Grieg, and Gade. Amongst the "honorary academicians" of the same institution is Miss Fanny Cox, of London, a lady with whose identity and claims to such an honour we are ashamed to confess ourselves unacquainted.

By command of Her Majesty the Queen, the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society will give a special performance of Sullivan's "The Golden Legend" (under the direction of the composer), at the Royal Albert Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, 8th May, at four o'clock. Her Majesty has graciously signified her intention of being present at the performance.

The distinguished Norwegian composer, Edward Grieg, though fully appreciated in his own country, has led a somewhat wandering life. We believe, however, that this is his first visit to England. Turning back to the MUSICAL WORLD of March 12, 1887, and the following numbers, we find, in Mr. Sundt's article upon Grieg, some facts which are of fresh interest now that the stranger is amongst us, and has directed some of his own music at the Philharmonic Society's concert.

Edward Grieg was born in 1843, at Bergen, Norway, and must by no means be called anything but Norwegian, let the temptation be what it may to apply the term Swedish to all Scandinavian products, including the musicians of Denmark and Norway. The same mistake is often made about Kjerulf's origin.

The budding genius was not forced on unduly, he took his first lessons from his mother, and composed his opus 1 at the age of 9, after his school hours. Ole Bull heard young Grieg play the piano some six years afterwards, and persuaded the parents to send the promising youth to Leipsic. Here Grieg arrived in 1858, and from that time he devoted himself assiduously to his work, gaining encouragement, by the way from that good genius of young composers, Liszt, from Kjerulf also, and gradually winning the regard of other musicians, and even conquering the hesitating public of his native Bergen.

The national instinct is strong in Grieg. His aim was to create a type of Norwegian music on the numerous motives to be found in the national songs and dances. During his travels and studies—four years in Leipsic, a winter in Italy, a long stay at Copenhagen, where he met his wife; a visit to Liszt at Rome, travels in Holland, France, and elsewhere—this idea did not leave him, but is well carried out through his work, revealing itself in every turn of his Concerto in A minor, his beautiful 'cello and violin sonatas with piano, no less than in his songs. This was accomplished under very serious disadvantages, for at that period Norway had not long awakened to a sense of independent art-life; the poets had begun by raising their voices in a chorus of defiant praise of Norwegian individuality, and Ole Bull and Kjerulf were the first musicians to take up the cue, the former boisterously, and not heeding the ridicule he sometimes brought on the cause; the latter with quiet hand and a mind not quite unfettered by his classical leanings. Grieg's powerful and original genius was able to complete the work, and therefore we have in the forms and developments of this composer's music something fresh and fragrant which, pace M. Gounod, is neither French nor German, Italian nor English, but distinctly Norwegian.

The residence of the composer in Norway has been attended with some amusing incidents. Thus we are told how his hut at the Hardangerfjord was taken up by the roots, as it were, by friendly hands and deposited in a securer nook at the edge of a forest, thus anticipating the wonderful transport of a large American hotel which we have lately heard about. Nowhere was "the blood of his heart" spent as in the music created in this little cottage overlooking a lovely bay and sheltered by a lofty hill. At Christiania Grieg conducted the Philharmonic Society for many years; but Bergen, his native town, claims his first and chief regard. Here he has been building himself a picturesque villa on the Nordaas Lake.

When Grieg appears in Christiania he is received with almost Royal honours by the public, while his fellow-musicians, and the King, and the Parliament, have severally recognised his merits by conferring upon him the Fellowship of the Royal Swedish Academy of Music, an annual honorary salary, and the knighthood of the Order of St. Olaf.

Scandinavia and Scandinavian music, this time represented by Denmark, will be well to the front also this summer, when the Anglo-Danish Exhibition comes on. A Danish band of thirty musicians, under Mr. Lumbje, of Copenhagen, will discourse the sweet music of their country on the opening day and afterwards.

The Stock Exchange Orchestral Society and Male Voice Choir will give their last subscription concert at St. James's Hall, on Wednesday, May 9th, when the band will perform Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, the ballet music to Pouchielli's "La Gioconda," etc. Miss Cloeté Brown will be the vocalist, and Mr. Sternberg the violinist.

No better programme has at any time for some while back been presented at the St. George's Hall than the entertainment which Mr. and Mrs. German Reed are now providing. The first piece under the title of "Wanted an Heir," contains some good lyrics by Mr. Malcolm Watson, and is set to very pleasing music by the ever busy Mr. Alfred J. Caldicott. The plot is sufficiently well-woven of slight material to sustain the interest, and Mr. Alfred German Reed's acting of the old farmer is excellent. The management have not yet found a suitable substitute for the late Mr. North Home, but Miss Fanny Holland shows to better advantage in this piece than in her previous essay.

Mr. Corney Grain excels himself in his new holiday sketch, "Mossoo in London." Three of his recent efforts have lacked the old fire, and we welcome his return to the sparkling vitality of his earlier methods. Mr. Corney Grain is content to observe the oddities and mannerisms of society, and put them down without malice. Can it be that the success of Mr. Grossmith's "The Mikado in Hamburg" induced Mr. Corney Grain to go to "foreign parts" for inspiration? Whatever the cause, the result is most happy, and Mr. and Mrs. German Reed are to be congratulated on the excellence of their present programme.

It is rumoured that a certain percentage of intending pilgrims to the fane of high musical art in the St. Jam

Hall, overflow into that part devoted to the band of minstrels which "never performs out of London." The Moore and Burgess Easter programme is excellent indeed, but there is a growing tendency to shelve the truly nigger melodies which have a beauty entirely their own. There is, moreover, a music-hall interlude supplied by the "Lupinos," which is a very poor substitute for the delightful "nigger fun," which appeared in the programme previous to Christmas. The musical portion of the programme is attractive, for it can be listened to with pleasure without effort, and there are some new and some delightfully old jokes.

The sale which began on April 16th, of tickets in sets (for all three days) for the Handel Festival, has been very satisfactory, and a most successful event is consequently assured. The sets of tickets carrying a choice of best seats have precedence, but now the single seats are being allotted. There are applications from all parts of Europe. A large influx of American visitors is also certain. The complex and detailed arrangements for the great musical celebration are already well advanced.

The Century for May contains an article on Bird music, by Mr. S. P. Cheney, in which the following extraordinary tribute is paid to the vocal gifts of the owl.

"White of Selborne says that one of his musical friends decided that 'all owls hoot in B flat;' another, that 'they vary some, almost a half-note below A'; another still, that 'the owls about the village hoot in three different keys—in G flat, in F sharp, in B flat, and in A flat.' This Yankee owl, true to the instincts of the soil, hooted in a key of his own, E flat. Though all owls undoubtedly indulge in vocal expression, the little screech-owl is probably their best musical representative. Indeed, in point of individuality of style, this artist stands alone, and must be ranked as a singer. To be sure, he has nothing of the spontaneous joy of the robin, of the frolic flow of the bobolink, nothing of the clear, clean vigour of the oriole; but he surpasses them all in tender, dulcet sentiment. Never attempting a boisterous strain, his utterances are pensive and subdued, often like a faint cry of despair. Chary of his powers, the screech-owl cuts his programme tormentingly short: and it is only after many trials that one is able to collect the disjointed strains that make his medley entire. Just at dark, some pleasant evening, you will hear his low, faint tremors. The owl ascends the scale generally not more than one or two degrees; the charm lies in his manner of descent, sometimes by a third, again by a fourth, and still again by a sixth. So rapidly and neatly is it done; that an expert violinist could not easily reproduce it. Perhaps the descent of the whinny of a horse comes the nearest to it of any succession of natural sounds."

The third annual soirée in aid of the Lyric Club Artists' Benefit Fund took place in the Galleries of the Royal Institute, Piccadilly, on Thursday evening last, the 26th April. The programme was unusually strong, and the guests numbered about 700. Amongst those who assisted, or were present, were: Madame Nordica, Miss Hope Glenn, Mrs. Stanley Stubbs, Mr. M. Mercer-Adam, Mr. Blakeley, Herr A. Brousil, Mr. H. Bracey, Mr. Wilfred Bendall, Mr. A. J. Caldicot, Mrs. M. A. Carlisle, Miss Sybil Carlisle, Miss Carmichael, Mr. C. Hayden Coffin, Miss Mary Curran, Miss Laura Dennis, Signor Luigi Denza, Mr. Cotsford Dick, Signor Carlo Ducci, Miss Ehrenberg, Miss Clara Gessler, Miss Marianne Gessler, Miss Carlotta Elliot, Madame Isabel Fassett, M. Frank, Mr. W. Ganz, Mr. Giddens, Miss Alice Gomes, Mr. Corney Grain, Mr. Richard Green, Mr. George Grossmith, Herr Haackman, Miss Marguerite Hall, Mr. Orlando Harley, Mr. Arthur Hervey, Miss Agnes Janson, Mr. Hirwen Jones, Mr. Lawrence Kellie, Mr. Henry Lebreton, Miss de Lido, Mr. Ernest Lake, Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Edith Marriott, Mr. Alec. Marsh, Mr. William Nicholl, Miss Louise Phillips, Mrs. Hughes Poltzer, Mr. George Power, Signor Randegger, Mr. Herbert Sims Reeves, Mr. Jack Robertson, Mr. Carl Rosa, Madame Sanderini, Miss Lucillie Saunders, Mr. William Shakespeare, Miss Sherrington, Miss José Sherrington, Mr. Joseph Tapley, Miss Marie Tempest, Miss Hope Temple, Captain Thatcher, Mr. A. Goring Thomas, Mr. Herbert Thorndike, Miss Geraldine Ulmar, Miss Henden Warde, Mr. Milton Wellings, Mr. Johannes Wolff, Hon. Alec. Yorke, and Mr. Luther Munday.

The Milan "Trovatore" states that Boito, the composer, has been created Knight of the Order of Civic Merit, of Savoy, a high honour, and unlike most orders, not a barren honour, being coupled with a pension of 1,200 francs a-year.

Madame Melba, the Australian prima-donna, who will be one of the bright particular stars of Mr. Rosa's season, has recently been singing Ophelia in M. Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," at Brussels. The critics regret that she sang the part in Italian, and one of them thinks that not being able to sing in French, she might as well have sung in English. "However," he adds gallantly, "anything that falls from the lips of Madame Melba is acceptable."

Bach's Passion Music according to St. Matthew will be performed on Wednesday, May 16, in the concert-room of the Conservatoire, by the Amateur Choral Society, "Concordia," under its conductor, M. Widor. This will be the second performance of the masterpiece ever given in Paris, the first having taken place under M. Lamoureux's direction fourteen years ago.

Franz Götze, the German tenor, whose death is announced, began his career as a violinist, and in 1831 led the orchestra at the Weimar Court Theatre. Later on, his grand voice attracted notice, and Götze left his place in the orchestra to "star" as a shining light on the boards. In 1853, at the age of forty, after a series of successes, he was allowed to withdraw into the comparative retirement of a professorship of singing at the Leipsic Conservatoire, where he formed many excellent pupils. The late artist is favourably mentioned in the Wagner and Liszt correspondence, having in an emergency taken the part of "Lohengrin" at Weimar, long after he had retired from the stage.

There is good news for harpists in the announcement of six Aptommas matinées, on succesive Wednesdays, beginning on May 23, at the Steinway Hall. Besides harp and pianoforte solos, the instruments will be heard in combination with the violin, cello', organ, harmonium, and voice.

The Bayreuth Theatre will be provided with electric light inside and out, and the road from the town also, so that the walk home after a performance need frighten none of the pilgrims, be the night ever so moonless.

"Otello" was produced at New York on April 16, exciting general interest and much discussion. The performance, from all accounts, was far from perfect, and critics concur in giving little credit to Signor Marconi, the impersonator of the Moor, and faint praise to Signora Tetrazzini, the Desdemona. Signor Galassi, however, is said to have made an excellent Iago. Be the performance good, bad, or indifferent, it succeeds in leaving England and France in a still more unenviable position than they were when only Italy, Germany, Hungary, Austria, and Russia, were before them in enterprise. "Freund's Music and Drama," is justified in claiming for New York the honour of being one of the leading musical cities of the world.

"Like most philharmonic programmes, it was much too long, and the absurdity has been committed of winding up with a novelty, which we must, on principle, decline to notice. —[London MUSICAL WORLD.] We do not wholly comprehend this. Is it because the composer and the work both suffer by being placed where the tired orchestra and, it may be, vexed conductor, cannot do justice to either?" says the Boston Traveller. Most certainly.

The artists who take part in "Parsifal" this summer are the following: As Kundry—Mesdames Materna, Malten, and Sucher; as Parsifal—Herren Gudehus, Winkelmann and perhaps Van Dyck; as Amfortas—Herren Reichmann and Scheidemantel; as Gurnemanz—Herren Wiegand and Gillmeister; as Klingsor—Herren Planck and Scheidemantel.

In "Die Meistersinger" will be cast: As Hans Sachs—Herren Reichmann, Gura, Planck, and perhaps Scheidemantel; as Pogner—Herren Wiegand and Gillmeister; as Eva—Mesdames Malten, Sucher, and Bettaque; as Walther Stolzing—Herren Gudehus, Winkelmann, and Van Dyck; as Magdalene—Frau Staudigl; as Beckmesser—Herren Friedrichs and Kürner; as David—Herren Schrödter and Hofmüller; as Kothner—Herren Planck and Hettstedt.

TWO NEW WORKS BY CHARLES GOUNOD.

The firm of G. Hartmann and Co., of Paris, will publish immediately two new sacred works by Charles Gounod, which are to be performed for the first time at Rheims, on the occasion of the solemnities for the beatification of Jean Baptiste de la Salle, who owes this posthumous honour to his having been the founder of the "Ecoles de la Doctrine Chrétienne." One of these works is the "Quatrième messe solennelle," the other is a "Te Deum." M. Gounod is one of the chosen few who cannot speak too often nor too long, and any addition he is pleased to make to the long catalogue of his compositions will always be welcomed, and more than anywhere else in his own country and in England.

The "Quatrième messe solennelle" and the "Te Deum" are solely and emphatically sacred works, and very seldom, if ever, the eminent composer was more inspired than he has been this time in the musical rendering of the sacred text. Once more we see the truth of the old saying that "the simplest means are the best." The Mass is written for four voices with organ accompaniment, in the strict ecclesiastical style, and on a curious theme of seven notes from the intonation of the Catholic liturgy. The "Te Deum" is also written for four voices, alternating with solos or a small number of choristers, but the organ accompaniment is, on two occasions, in the Sanctus and fiat misericordia tua, relieved by the addition of six harps.

From the days of Palestrina to those of Brahms, religious music has certainly undergone a series of radical changes, without losing anything of its severity and grandeur, yet for church services nothing is fitter than compositions alla Palestrina. So far no instrument has been invented that can approach the human voice in power of expression, and the harmony that we instinctively understand to be the noblest, is the one produced by the combination of the four different registers of the human voice, and the stern and severe tone of the accompanying organ serving to give relief to the innate pathos of the timbre of the other instrument. We must not forget that, going to church, we have to look upon music as a subordinate part of the ceremony, and that it must help us towards raising our thoughts up from what is of the earth earthly, and not to call our minds away from the service to what might be listened to with undivided attention at St. James's Hall or the Albert Hall; and this is the very point which Gounod has aimed at, and with perfect success, in the music he has written for Rheims. It is no imitation of the old masters, no sham Christian art, no mere show of scholastic devices, but an expression of true devotion, of deep faith, of real catholicity of feeling, which feeling, because it is sincere, finds as powerful a manifestation in the strictest style of church music, as other feelings have full justice done to them when the same author renders them, with an equal spirit of truth and of fitness of things, either in the dramatic style for the stage, or in a lighter style for the drawing-room.

We do not intend to say by this that the Mass or the "Te Deum," would not be acceptable in concert rooms; far from it; both compositions could not fail to produce a noble impression, especially on English audiences, and especially if sung by the choir of societies whose familiarity with the rendering of the choral numbers of oratorios would make them the fittest to approach the essentially religious character of these choral works: but we mean that a performance during divine service must perforce strike the congregation with the sense of religious awe.

THE FORTHCOMING OPERA SEASON.

The preparations for Mr. Harris's forthcoming season of Italian opera are now fairly complete, and the shadow of the coming event may be forecast in outline. The subscription will consist of thirty-two performances, extending over eight weeks, and commencing on Monday, May 14. In case the success is such as is anticipated that time may be extended, and extra performances will also be given during the season. One thing is greatly in Mr. Harris's favour; he will have no competition. Last year we had three Italian operas, all of which were, pecuniarily speaking, heavy failures. It is just possible that the interest of London amateurs being concentrated on one enterprise may keep that enterprise afloat, and such an issue would be a perfect triumph for the manager, considering the moribund state in which Italian opera has existed among us for many years past. Mr. Harris has taken a step in the right direction by forsaking his own theatre for Covent Garden. Musical amateurs are a gregarious species, and certain amusements become in their minds connected with certain places. Covent Garden is the acknowledged headquarters of Italian opera, and it might probably have taken a number of years before the current of opera-goers would have been diverted to the other side of Bow-street. This necessity having been obviated it will only require another turn in the tide of fashion to fill Covent Garden once more with the élite of society which is said to have haunted it in the palmy days of Italian opera. It will cause disappointment to lovers of music when we inform them that not a single new opera will be produced in the course of the season, and that more especially Verdi's "Otello," after having been given successfully in Italy, Germany, Russia, and even America, will continue mute and inglorious in the country to which, in a poetic sense, it owes its birth. Mr. Harris probably was not a free agent in this matter, and had to consult the taste of his patrons, who have confined his choice to such familiar work as Gounod's "Faust" and "Romeo and Juliet," Wagner's "Lohengrin," Bizet's "Carmen," Verdi's "La Traviata" and "Il Trovatore," Mozart's "Don Giovanni," and others. It may, however, be expected that many, if not all, of these works will be mounted and stage-managed in such a manner as almost to gain the charm of novelty. Mr. Harris has secured a collection of all the talents, and so numerous are the engagements which have been made that the chief difficulty will be that of employing all the artists whose names appear in the prospectus. A rival manager would, indeed, find it difficult to cast any of the favourite operas in a representative manner. The list of sopranos includes Mesdames Albani, Valleria, Arnoldson, Hauk, and Nordica; Madame Trebelli and, perhaps, Madame Scalchi will be the principal contralti; and the list of tenors, baritones, and basses includes such names as the brothers De Reszke, Ravelli, Lassalle, Del Puente, Cotogni, and Novara. There will also be several new comers of good repute, such as Madame Melba, the Australian soprano who recently made a sensation at Brussels, and will appear as Lucia on the opening night; Miss M'Intyre, who will play Michaela to Madame Nordica's Carmen; and Madame Columbia, who will make her début later in the season. The ballet will be under the direction of Madame Katti Lanner, and the duties of conductor will be shared by Signori Mancinelli and Randegger, both eminently fitted for that task. It is proposed to increase the number and improve the quality of the chorus, and the orchestra will include such excellent artists as Messrs. Carrodus (leader), Betjemann, Lawrence, Howell, White, Radcliffe, Horton, Gomez, Anderson, Stennebruggen, and others.—The Times.

THE DEATH OF MADAME CROSMOND.

The tragic death of poor Helene Crosmond has naturally sent a thrill through the operatic world. The deceased lady, although not an artist of the first order, was much respected in the profession, and the violent step which she took at last came as a terrible surprise even to her most intimate friends. Instead of indulging in general reflections on the uncertainty of human life and the dangers of a professional career, we think it more respectful to the memory of the artist to state the bare facts of the case as they appeared at the inquest held before Mr. John Troutbeck, deputy-coroner for Westminster, at St. George's Hospital, on Monday last. A brother of the deceased said that she was the widow of Edmund Crosmond-Turner, a silk merchant, and was thirty-five years old. Witness saw her six or seven weeks before her death. She had had years of trouble—much more than ordinarily was the lot of a human being. Trouble had followed her since the death of her husband. She was cheerful, however, when witness last called on her, but complained of sleepless nights. She had taken opiates lately, and, unfortunately, this had become a confirmed habit. Mr. Thomas Young, a solicitor, of Essex-street, Strand, said he was consulted by deceased. On Thursday last she called at his office at about half-past four, and had a long conversation with him in connection with business negotiations between her and Mr. Augustus Harris. He saw that gentleman for her, and brought back the news of the breaking of a probable contract which would have brought her in £40 a week. This distressed her very much, and she said it would mean utter ruin to her, as it had been published that she was likely to appear as a prima donna. On Friday he received a postcard from her, saying that he was "not to act in the matter of H.," but at that time she had destroyed herself. The deceased made no reference to putting an end to her life; but he was not surprised when he read the news, for he knew that she was of a very sensitive temperament. She had had a contract with Mr. Harris, who had advanced £20, but she had torn up the contract paper. Mary Godbold, of 25, Upper Bedford place, said the deceased lived in her house, and had given notice to leave on the Wednesday, but requested permission to stay till Thursday. All her things were packed up. John William Cole, a cabman, driving a four-wheeled cab, said that about 7.30 on Thursday last the deceased came to him on the stand in Northumberland-avenue, and asked him to drive her to Knightsbridge. When he got into Piccadilly he heard a report of firearms, and the window of the cab was broken. He looked round, and saw the deceased lying on the floor of the cab. When she engaged him her manner was apparently very cool and collected, and when he asked her at what part of Knightsbridge she would like to be set down, she said, "I will tell you that when we get there." After the shot a police-constable got into the cab, and told him to drive as fast as possible to the hospital. Thomas Walker said he was walking down Piccadilly when he heard a report of firearms, the crashing of glass, and a loud scream. He called out to the cabman that something was wrong in the cab, and he saw a lady in it in a crouching position. He at once fetched a constable. Police-constable M'Leod, 114 C, fetched by the last witness, said he found the deceased in the cab in a doubled-up position, unconscious, with her head between her knees. The pistol produced was in the bottom of the cab, underneath the seat. The deceased was insensible. The pistol was loaded in four chambers, and a fifth had been recently discharged. Henry Wood, an assistant to a firm of gunmakers, identified the pistol as one he sold on Wednesday evening last to a lady, who also purchased twelve cartridges. She said she was buying it for her mother. Witness at her request showed her how to load it. The pistol was loaded when she took it away. Mr. Lawson, house surgeon at St. George's Hospital, who saw the deceased when she was brought to the hospital, said she had a punctured wound on either temple, and the tissue was very much bruised on the right side, from which the shot must have been fired. She lived till twenty-five minutes past three on Friday morning, and the cause of death was laceration of the brain. The coroner having remarked upon the troubles which the deceased had experienced, the jury returned a verdict that "The deceased committed suicide while in a state of unsound mind."

A letter written by Madame Crosmond two days before her death, and communicated by a correspondent to the Daily News, throws much light on the immediate cause of the tragic event. She says:—"I have been at death's door. Sleepless nights through intense neuralgia in my head obliged me to take an overdose of a mixture which was prescribed me by my doctor to relieve pain. After some considerable hours, I was brought to life by the vigilant care of two medical men. I feel still queer, especially about the eyes. I am thinking of going away for a little while."

Reviews.

The second issue of Mr. Klein's "Musical Notes," although a little less ornamental than its predecessor, contains as many interesting facts, pleasantly and chattily narrated by the author, whose criticism, even if adverse, is always couched in temperate language. Whether one agrees with or differs from that criticism depends, of course, upon individual opinion, for critics, like doctors, are apt to differ. But everyone interested in the progress of music, and especially of English music, will find Mr. Klein's work a most useful compendium and handbook, the more so as a complete alphabetical index makes reference an easy matter. The various musical events are grouped under the months in which they took place, and this work furnishes a curious illustration of the unequal way in which musical doings are distributed over the various parts of the year; thus June occupies twenty-two pages, dreary November twelve, and August rather less than one and a-half. There is some balm for the musical critics in the last mentioned fact, although the editor of a musical paper might look upon it in a different light. The "Musical Notes" is published at The Stage office, Clement's Inn, Strand.

MR. THEODORE WERNER'S RECITAL.

On Monday evening last Mr. Theodore Werner inaugurated the somewhat ambitious enterprise of giving three violin recitals, with orchestral accompaniment. The orchestra of about 60 performers had been carefully selected by Mr. Manns, who also conducted, and gave excellent renderings of Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, the "Romance" and "Air de Ballet," in G, from Schubert's "Rosamunde," and the introduction to Act III. from "Lohengrin." Mr. Werner's chief effort was the Beethoven Concerto. He seemed at first to be nervous, and his intonation was by no means free from fault; but this defect wore off as he warmed to his work, and he subsequently played with purity and decision. Mr. Werner is a performer of more than ordinary merit. His executive powers are well developed, his shake being particularly good, but his tone is somewhat lacking in fulness and richness. In the Beethoven Concerto his phrasing was refined throughout, but the lack of tone prevented the full effect of the work being realised. Mr. Werner appeared to more advantage in the Adagio and Finale from Vieuxtemps' Concerto in E, and the 1st movement of Paganini's uninteresting, although enormously difficult Concerto in E flat, and his power of cantabile playing was well illustrated by Wilhelmj's arrangement of Chopin's 2nd Nocturne given as an encore. There was a large and appreciative audience.

The Organ World.

ON AN OLD TOPIC.

I.

A recent writer in the Guardian with a good deal of courage and with some judgment, has made an advance on that thorny pathway, the subject of church music. F. L. N., the writer in question, reveals something of a dogmatic spirit in the very title he selects, "Church Music—as it is, and as it ought to be." A good many of us know what it is, but surely few are able, at least in dealing with mortal performers, to say what it ought to be. When men talk and write about church music, they enter an arena in which spirits strive towards a standard only to be reached when the song of the redeemed shall arise above the turmoil and disputes of a mortal state, which shall be overwhelmed in the immortal harmony and the "perfect diapason" of the heavenly choir; and no gifts or attainments to be known on this earth will ever produce the church music which earnest men can proclaim as what "it ought to be." No topic has probably agitated the world of art so long and so seriously as music which, allied to religious duties, has become in the fullest meaning of the phrase "the handmaid of religion." The writer in the Guardian practically divides his theme into two departments, vocal and instrumental church music. Though one rejoices to know that he is prepared to say his most earnest and judicious words in favour of the highest department, vocal music, it is very soon evident that his views are not sufficiently broad for a thorough consideration of the whole subject. He has, again, a grievance against organs and organists which may be described as nearly strong enough to produce in his mind what is known as an animus. Still much that he says bears the stamp of earnest thought and sound common sense. He is quite right in protesting against the inefficient and neglected state of our choirs, and in pointing out the necessity for more painstaking and methodical methods of choir-training. But he does not face the initial difficulties, the want of pure, sympathetic voices, and the absence of individual preliminary training; and without good voices and personal preparation, organists and choirmasters cannot build up really satisfactory choirs. The low standard of our church music is brought about directly by want of means, material, and time for preparation; and indirectly by the privileges of, and importance assigned, rightly or wrongly, to congregational singing, which has a tendency to inoculate poisonous notions into the general policy of church music such as the idea that everyone has a right to sing in everything that is to be sung in church, consequently every voice and all forms of educational neglect may be acceptable or permissible in church; that imperfect, degraded art, which we should be ashamed to offer to our friends, may be offered in church, if our hearts be tuned aright at the moment of presentation; this last truth being one we trifle dangerously with, not being properly concerned that our offering possesses the condition of value to ourselves, a condition which alone completely proves the presence of deep earnestness; and thus with presumptuous carelessness are we neglecting to take such preparatory pains as will make our song-offerings even decently presentable. It is only natural that church music should be held in low esteem, when we wilfully neglect to uplift it as an institution to the level of art standards we fail not to apply to music in the concert room. The writer of the article in the Guardian is fully justified in asking for pure vocal music to be rendered by intelligent and well-prepared choirs. Such art forms the purest church music, and is far more likely to be free from meretricious, and in church, presumptuous dramaturgy, than is music in which the instrumental element is allowed to unduly preponderate. Doubtless there is tendency to set up something like organic tyranny in our churches; but the organ, properly used, is not "a necessary evil," but a power for good. The money spent on our church organs has been wisely, and not needlessly, laid out, for the conditions of the musical art demand the use of some form of instrumental accompaniment, and it must be granted that in all services in which congregational singing plays an important part, the organ, like charity, covers a multitude of sins, and often makes a method of performance tolerable, which would, without its beneficent aid, be absolutely intolerable. Then, acoustically, the large amount of unison and octave singing properly characterising congregational music necessitates the presence of deep-toned and doubled bass notes, not to add the corresponding presence of brighter, higher-pitched sounds than the voices supply. The cause of our bad church singing is not primarily, as stated by this writer, the "multitude and excessive use of organs," but the want of original attention, and the application of the necessary means whereby a higher class of choral music could alone be secured. Our organists are well aware of the difficulties and requirements of what ought to be the best of all art; they know full well that the dense tones and hard temperament of the organ are unfavourable to the development of pure vocal music, and they are deeply concerned and anxious regarding the behind-the-age condition of our church choirs, willing to give their best strength to the cultivation of more perfect vocal music in church, and to employ the organ exactly and only upon the lines the dictates of the best art conditions indicate. In their present work and pressing difficulties, our organists deserve and claim the earnest sympathy and practical aid of all able to advance the cause of good church music. The writer of the article in the Guardian has, on the whole, done good service by his well-meant, and, in many sentences, timely words.

"FALSE RELATIONS."

Part IV.

The inverted chord of the super-tonic has been shown to be derivable from the dominant, therefore this chord may precede or follow the chord of the dominant, without offence to the ear or to any true principle, either in its inverted or uninverted forms. A frequent use, with excellent effect, of this succession of chords may be found in the song "Vaghe Stelle," from the opera "Erismena," by Cavalli, both in uninverted and inverted forms. This song is quoted in extenso in Hullah's History of the Transition Period, to which reference may be made. The leap of a fourth from the root of the super-tonic to the root of the dominant chord is akin to the progression from dominant to tonic harmony; while the super-tonic being common to the two chords confirms the relationship between them. I regard the availability to use this succession of chords in contrapuntal work as being of extreme value. Especially in such a case as where the dominant is preceded or succeeded by the sub-dominant in a bass canto fermo. It may be observed that Cherubini gives this succession of chords amongst those which are interdicted by the rule. An inverted form of the super-tonic chord, followed by the dominant harmony, has been already exhibited in the extract from Albrechtsberger, which was quoted in the earlier part of this paper.

The firm bond of relationship established between the harmonies of the super-tonic and dominant by the common note A is so excellent in effect, as to be a sufficient reason for again referring to this example to illustrate this argument.

A general impression prevails from reading theoretical books on counterpoint, that the well-known Latin couplet—

Mi contra Fa
Diabolus est in musica,

held vigorous rule over the writings of the ancients. So far as my own reading has led me, I have failed to observe anything like repugnance to the juxtaposition of these intervals. Indeed, if we take the writings of Palestrina, or of our own Tallis, and others who must have known the rules of their time, such is certainly not the case.

In proof of this assertion reference might be made to the first five bars of Palestrina's "Stabat Mater," in which the chords of A major, G major, and F major are used in the order here given; moreover, this occurs twice within the limited distance already named, besides other cases of the tritone. Tallis's service may also be quoted. Take, for instance, the first six bars to the "Gloria" to the "Benedictus," where each bar might be given as an illustration of the non-relationship of the tritone.

I am aware that rules are said to have come down to us for alteration, during performance, of notes—by sharp or flat—for the avoidance of Mi contra Fa in the music of this period. Granting that the instincts of singers of that time were allowed free play, I should regret the results of the instinctive alterations of any singers of this time during performance of these passages. If the original is harsh, the altered version would, I am afraid, be no better.

That the use of the close succession of sub-dominant and dominant was quite common about the same time, may be seen, for instance, in such madrigals as "When all alone, my pretty love," by Converso; "Ye swains, take counsel," by Ferretti; and "There's a lady sweet and kind," by our own countryman, Thomas Ford.

An early specimen of the unprepared use of the "added sixth" and its appearance as the super-tonic seventh leads to a thought upon the collision of the tritone between that chord and its natural resolution into the chord of the dominant, where, of course, the tritone must be present.

Instances of such a succession being used by the masters of the Elizabethan period may be found in a ballet by Morley, entitled "What saith my dainty darling"; in a madrigal, "Awake, sweet love," by Dowland; and also by the Italian master, Carissimi, in his oratorio, "Jephthah."

The derivation of the "added sixth" has been already alluded to as being from the dominant, or dominant and super-tonic, according to different theories; therefore, the natural and correct nature of these passages is asserted.

There are still other positions in which the tritone may occur with propriety. When the chord of the sixth and third upon the super-tonic is taken, the tritone is present between the third and sixth. If this chord is preceded by the sub-dominant chord, the chords must be connected harmonies by the presence of the sub-dominant as a common note in both. Purcell has used the succession of chords with excellent effect in the anthem, "O God, Thou art my God."

Again, as a natural sequence to the preceding example, when the sub-dominant precedes the dominant chord, and the sub-dominant remains as a suspended discord in the dominant harmony, the tritone is unavoidably present, but with correctness and propriety, as in an instance to be found in the Festival "Te Deum," by the same composer.

An attempt will now be made to derive, from what has been already said, some practical results, which may be of assistance to the student of counterpoint; who will almost certainly fall into the hands of Giant Despair over this rule of the tritone for want of any help he will get from the theorists. All the examples that have been given have undeniable authority, if authority is attached to great reputation. From their example something ought to be gained.

In all these instances a direct, indirect, or an ambiguous connection has been shown to be present. Whether this was in the mind of the composers is extremely doubtful; but they uttered what they felt to be true. May we not accept these truths now, after hundreds of years of onward progression in scientific knowledge of the art; and free ourselves from the narrow dictum of the schoolmen, which has clearly never been observed in its entirety in any age, as far as my knowledge aids me.

The occasions upon which I would suggest relaxations of the rule against non-relationship, arising from the juxtaposition of the tritone, in contrapuntal writing, are the following:—

1. When dominant harmony succeeds sub-dominant harmony in approaching a close.

2. When dominant harmony succeeds the chord of the super-tonic, either when the latter is in the first inversion or as the triad.

3. When dominant chord succeeds the chord of the "added sixth," as it was formerly known, or when the latter appears as a chord of the seventh on the super-tonic.

(This is closely allied to the preceding exception.)

4. When the chord of sixth on super-tonic is preceded or followed by the chord of sub-dominant.

5. When dominant harmony is preceded by the chord of sub-dominant, and the root of the latter remains as a suspended discord.

Each of these exceptions has been shown to be according to the practice and manner of the great masters of the contrapuntal epoch of musical art; and are not violations of the practice and pure diatonic style of their writings.

The rule against the tritone should be firmly upheld whenever entire non-relationship exists between two chords.

Take, for instance, the triad of the mediant preceded or followed by the chord of the sub-dominant or super-tonic. This non-relationship is so keenly felt as to have led to this much abused triad on the mediant being regarded as a dissonant. Now how can a minor triad on the mediant in the major mode be a dissonant in the key, when it is found clearly in the 10th, 12th, and 15th harmonics of the series springing from the key note, and moreover perfectly in tune? Clearly then the sub-dominant is the intruder in such a case; because it can only be obtained by inversion. The triad on the mediant is undoubtedly a concord against which we should avoid placing in close proximity to it chords in which the sub-dominant is present.

In concluding this portion of the subject, let me disclaim, emphatically, any revolutionary spirit, or any desire to break away from the practice of the early masters; but to follow a pure, diatonic, contrapuntal principle in accordance with their methods of writing. My firm conviction is, that to follow the gradual development of any art through the ages is the best and most natural pathway which each individual mind can follow in the development of itself.

If what has been here advanced is helpful to any earnest student, that will be an ample reward for any effort made to remove some of the difficulties I found in the study of counterpoint from the way of him who would follow the same desirable course towards a sound and vigorous knowledge of our beautiful art. That what has been said will escape severe and perhaps hostile criticism I cannot expect; but, of this I am well assured, that so much of what has been said that is true will certainly prevail, and what is not true will fall to the ground valueless.

At this point I feel I must pause. The dimensions of the subject I have undertaken to address you upon seem to have grown as I wrote; therefore I must ask you to accept this portion as an instalment of the whole. So far I have only been able to speak of the great and peculiar non-relationship of the diatonic style of writing. With your permission, I will continue this paper upon another occasion, more especially with regard to the peculiar non-relationships to be found in the modern and chromatic style of musical composition.

A morning concert in aid of the fund being raised to assist Mr. Constantine, sen., will be given at Princes' Hall, Piccadilly, on May 11th, at 3. A large array of distinguished artists will assist, these ladies and gentlemen having generously given their services.

HYMNOLOGY AND EDITORS.

The remonstrance of Mr. Selkirk, in the current number of "Blackwood's Magazine," anent the literary changes and manipulators of our popular hymns is certainly timely. Many will remember Cardinal Newman's objection to the addition of a stanza to his "Lead kindly light." But the practice is by no means new; and it seems to have been the rule that the hymn writers of one age should freely alter the work of all preceding hymnologists. This has been going on with impunity, and has been practised and sanctioned by leading churchmen and devotional writers ever since it became the fashion to make up collections of hymns. "If such liberties" observes Mr. Selkirk, "were taken with the text of Shakespeare, Shelley, and Browning, societies identified with those authors all over the world would be in arms, and with good reason." The strange thing is the absence of respect for original texts on the part of those who practise the most exact and rigid respect for all they deem sacred, or connected therewith, in religion and art. Perhaps such a reckless spirit of change and alteration is in part, however, a reaction in thought against the fixity of text in service forms, and an effort of the mind to escape from antique into modern linguistic idioms. The attack on unscrupulous editors and revisers of devotional poetry in "Blackwood's Magazine," may pave the way to a similar onslaught upon the, it is to be feared, equally unscrupulous musical editors of hymn tunes, who, like their collaborateurs in verse, seem "determined to uproot the lines of history" in their several fields of labour. Thus we see the overloaded melodic details of the old-fashioned English tunes planed—one might almost say plained—down, a course perhaps most musicians agree with; then we note the modernisation and chromatic enrichment of harmony; and of late there has been, in fit keeping with the spread of much verbal sentimentality, a tendency to make hymn tunes as sugary and part-song like as possible. There are, however, two motives which must be placed to the credit of the verbal and musical editors of hymns and hymn tunes: they are undoubtedly anxious to purify the text, so as to secure the utmost propriety of expression in connection with the enunciation of exalted devotional thought; and, in keeping with this view, they are solicitous to secure what at each epoch may be esteemed the best ecclesiastical style. On the whole, the world has probably gained from the labours of editors of sacred verse and song, who have eliminated much that may be described as in bad taste and have, with all their want of respect for original matter, done good service in preserving in improved forms much that might otherwise have passed away with the fashion of the times. Still it is well to inculcate principles of wholesome respect for text and historical methods; and it may be well to endeavour to impress upon editors and collectors a sense of responsibility in this regard; especially as the desire to retain original readings is a feeling which has been greatly revived during the past few years in both literature and music.

"THE MUSICAL REFORM."

"Church Choirs," one of a series of letters appearing in a New York paper from the pen of Dr. Eugene Mayer on Church Music, thus deals with choirs. It should be added that some of his remarks refer specially to that American institution, the quartet choir:

"Though the subject I have chosen has been nearly worn thread-bare by discussion, the amount that has been said is unfortunately more than equalled by what has been left unsaid. This must be my excuse for attempting to add a few words on a subject not always welcome. In a series of articles it is my purpose to examine the matter from the standpoint of choirs, organists, and congregations.

"Regarding choirs, our first question is: 'What is the best kind, or form, of choir? That is: (1) Shall we have a quartet; (2) or a chorus; (3) or a quartet and a chorus? An examination of the merits and defects of the various organizations may enable us to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion.

"First in order is the quartet. Its merit is, that, as a rule, it can give the music of the service in a more correct and finished manner than any other form of choir. I have said 'as a rule.' It unfortunately does not follow that such is always the case, as many things may militate against, and even totally prevent, such a result. If the singers are not personally interested in the service, a perfunctory and somewhat listless performance probably ensues. This indifference often has its excuse in a want of sympathy from the church and pastor. I would like, right here, to do my confreres the justice to say that I have known of but few such choirs. That there are some such, but few will incline to dispute. The chief trouble I have had, in an experience of over thirty years, is the tardiness and general aversion to practice—that is, real solid work—at rehearsals. They are stoutly opposed to the further rehearsing of anything which has once been given in service, alleging that they know the piece already. They individually take lessons of some singing teacher, and do not like suggestions from the director, unless he happen to be also the favourite teacher. Therefore, when they sing badly, the director rarely fails to receive the blame. A case in point happened in a Boston church where the writer was formerly organist. A new music committee (not a musical committee as often improperly termed, but in this case a very unmusical one) had been chosen. A friend, meeting the chairman after the election, rallied him on his ignorance of music. 'That is very true,' replied our chairman, 'but I know how to be chairman of a music committee as well as anybody in America.' 'Really!' answered the friend, 'pray, what is the secret?' 'Nothing easier,' was the rather inelegant reply; 'just wait until somebody enters a complaint, and then go and "blow up" the organist.'

"Another defect of the quartet is the liability to sickness of one of its members, whereby the whole service is ruined for the time being. This accident of sickness cannot invalidate the quartet and chorus, where the absence of one singer can only weaken but not entirely destroy the part. This brings us to examine the defects and excellencies of the chorus, or chorus and quartet.

"The chief defect of the chorus is the liability to coarseness of performance—easily remedied by increased rehearsal. Another defect is the want of regular attendance at rehearsals and services. A moderate salary, with written contract, will soon remedy this. But it would cost too much to pay all the singers! Let us see.

"There are few churches where any effort is made to secure good and properly effective music, that do not appropriate at least two thousand dollars per annum for the sustainment of the musical service. I, of course, refer to city churches. In suburban churches it is rarely difficult to secure a volunteer choir; the charm of the Eden musical service usually being a sufficient incentive to the attendance of young and desirable voices. Now, there can be furnished an organist, who should also be the director, and at least sixteen competent singers for the sum above named. The quartet can be secured by the selection of the best four to act as soloists. Unfortunately the love of prominence and leadership is so strong among musical amateurs, that they can be secured without extra pay. To be sure, they will scarcely sing as well as four professionals, but, taking the choir as a whole, I can give more and better music with such a choir than with the best quartet in existence; for it must be remembered that most of our greatest and best church music cannot be given by a quartet at all. Is this, then, the best solution of the problem? I would not like to say that unreservedly.

"This is not a mere matter of personal preference or opinion on my part. I simply wish the church to secure better music for the money they pay, and to see the quartet made effective by its proper contrast—the chorus choir. As the quartet is now, it is simply a beautiful picture without a frame. It is only when set in contrast with the chorus that the soloists shine forth in their true light, as all choral festivals easily prove.

"Did quartet choirs but consult their own interest, they would labour earnestly to secure the result I have so briefly set forth. The churches once supplied with a quartet and chorus would scarcely be tempted to return to the present ineffective methods. The lovers of quartet singing should have one anthem without the chorus. The lovers of chorus singing might be similarly gratified. The advocates of congregational singing could sing the hymns as usual. The practical question of 'want of room' for a quartet and chorus is easily solved by an architect. The other question of money is generally solved by increased pew rentals.

"Boy choirs are latterly much in vogue in the large cities. The chief defect is that, as soon as the boys learn to sing, their voices change and progress is defeated.

"It pays to do the right thing. This truism the church would do well to prove by acting fearlessly upon. Churches where the quartet and chorus have been tried have never been abandoned them without a quick return to this best form of all church choirs. The absurdity, even from a musical and artistic standpoint, of four singers leading the service, indeed, often doing the entire musical service unassisted, is too great to need comment. We should learn something from the experience of our elders. In an extended tour of the Old World, I never once saw nor heard an unassisted quartet choir in church. Why should we adopt what they long ago proved unsuccessful? That we shall arrive at the right way is but a question of time: let us lose no more of it."

The idea of combining the artistic quartet with the chorus choir is one deserving attention, whether the principle is carried out in surpliced or in choirs so arranged as to admit the use of mixed voices.

ORGANISTS AND THE CLERGY.

To the Editor of THE ORGAN WORLD.

SIR,—The article on the above subject in a recent issue calls attention to the very unsatisfactory relations which undoubtedly exist between many clergy and their organists. The views of your correspondent were doubtless read and acquiesced in by hundreds of organists. But, unfortunately, as it appears to me, there the matter ends. The clergy remain unconvinced as to the true state of the case.

Now, sir, I want to ask whether it would be possible for the College of Organists, through its Council, to lay before the clergy, in the manner that may be deemed fittest, some comprehensive and impartial statement on the subject. The two great points which such a statement should advance are, I venture to think, these:—

1. That the absolute authority of the rector, vicar, or clergyman in charge, is not for one moment questioned, but on the contrary fully acknowledged.

2. But that, as the organist of the present day is a specialist, and in the majority of cases a far better musician than the clergyman can possibly be, it is illogical and disastrous to religion and art, that he should be denied a practically free hand in all musical matters.

There are many details which cannot now be entered into, but I would say, in conclusion, that the work which the College has done in the past, and still is doing, by means of its examinations, is one which is calculated to gradually raise the status of the organist and force his claims for respect upon the clergy; and for that reason, if for no other, the standard required to be reached before a diploma can be gained, should not only be rigorously maintained, but perhaps even raised.—I am, sir, your obedient servant, PHAON.

RECITAL NEWS.

ALL SS. CHURCH, KENSINGTON PARK, W.—A special sacred recital was given on Sunday, April 8th, 1888:—

Organ chorus	"Your voices tune"	Handel.
Aria	"I know that my Redeemer"	Handel.
Violin solo	"Reverie," op. 22	Vieuxtemps.
Organ	"Pastorale"	Wély.
Aria	"Meditation upon a prelude"	Gounod-Bach.
Violoncello solo	"Andante" (concerto in A)	Goltermann.
Aria	"Waft her, angels"	Handel.
Organ, violin, and violoncello trio No. 6 in D		Haydn.

Soprano, Miss Norah Phyllis; tenor, Mr. Dan Smith; violin, Miss A. Dinelli; violoncello, Mr. G. Dinelli; organist, Mr. Ernest Lake. All present were earnestly asked to contribute to the offertory for the Organists' Benevolent Society. This was the first recital given in aid of that excellent charity, the Organists' Benevolent Society. It may be hoped that the kindly thought of example thus set will be widely followed.

CLEVELAND, U.S.—At Trinity Church, "Organ Meditations" have been given lately on Saturdays, by Mr. F. Norman Adams, the organist. The programmes have included—

Toccata in D minor	J. S. Bach.
Fuga Cromatica	Rheinberger.
Præludium in A minor	J. S. Bach.
Andante expressivo in D (MSS.)	F. Norman Adams.
Sonata VI., in D minor	Mendelssohn.
Grand Chorus in G Allegro moderato	Salomé.
Melodie in C Poco moderato
Sonata II., in C minor	Mendelssohn.
Offertoire No. 4, in G	Lefebure-Wély.
Fuga in G minor, "By request"	J. S. Bach.
From 4th Organ Concerto in F, Andante Maestoso	Handel.
Offertoire in D	Batiste.
Grand Chœur in D	Guilmant.
Musette in G, Andante Grazioso	E. H. Turpin.
Rondo in E flat, Allegro (MSS.)	F. Norman Adams.

Notes.

Herr Liepmannssohn's most recent catalogue (63 Charlottenstrasse, Berlin) contains a large collection of musical works of interest, including Bach's organ music, "Cecilia" (1853-4), organ works by Habert, Handel's Concertos (J. Walsh's edition), Mattheson's "Figured Bass School" (1732), "Kann man nicht in 2 oder 3 Monaten die Orgel gut u. regelmässig schlagen lernen?" (1789), and many other curious and valuable church and organ works. Spitta's life of Bach in German, organ music by Rinck, Fantasias, Toccatas, &c., by Sweelinck, Vogt's "Dictionary of Music" specially for organists, &c., are included in these.

Of the great poets who favoured the organ, Milton was an organ player, and S. T. Coleridge had a small organ in his house in the Lake district; and some of our modern poets have also delighted in the instrument. Many mention the organ in descriptions of cathedrals and churches.

In the Letters and Correspondence of the Rev. Sydney Smith (1831), the following passage occurs: "I have just taken possession of my preferment. The house is in Amen Corner—an awkward name on a card, and an awkward annunciation to the coachman on leaving any fashionable mansion. I find too (sweet discovery) that I give a dinner, every Sunday for three months in the year, to six clergymen and six singing men, at one o'clock." Amen Corner now contains some excellent residences for cathedral officers. It would be interesting to know whether the hospitable custom the great clerical wit alludes to is still the rule with canons in residence.

The London Gregorian Association Festival takes place in St. Paul's Cathedral on June 7th, when, as usual, Dr. C. Warwick Jordan will be the organist. There will be a choir of a thousand voices.

What of the wheel tax? The wheel has been successfully substituted by certain organ builders for the old-fashioned bellows blowing handle, and certain organists, nervous at the last new illustration of the rapacity of Chancellors of the Exchequer, would like to be informed whether the wheel, as applied to organ-blowing, is to be taxed. The fear is at present needless; when the showy coffee mills in our grocers' shops begin to disappear under the development of the new taxation, then one may begin to be concerned regarding the future of the less bright, but equally useful wheels used for bellows-blowing in our dark and secret organ chambers.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS' CALENDAR.

ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS.

You are kindly requested to write for Ainsworth's "New Patent Organ Pedal Combination List." Ainsworth's "New Patent" is perfectly unique and may be combined easily with any Piano. It is the only one which may be safely combined with any Piano without deteriorating the instrument. Having put down at my works two engines and machinery of the most desirable kind, I am now supplying my goods at a price which enables every organist and organ student to have always ready for use in his Studio an

ORGAN PEDAL PIANO,

Affording Perfectly Unique Pedal Practice.

34, Sheen Park, Richmond.

Dear Sir,—I have deferred writing to comment upon your Pedals and Action now attached to my pianoforte until I could satisfy myself of their utility and efficiency. I can now conscientiously say that they more than fulfil all my anticipations. Although I am no carpenter, aided by your lucid diagram I had little difficulty in attaching them myself, and it is impossible to over-estimate the comfort they give to me or to conceive the saving of time one experiences in one's own room.—Believe me, yours truly,

BURNHAM HORNER, F.R. Hist.S.

To Mr. Mr. Ainsworth.

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to bear testimony to the perfection of your Invention. I am more than satisfied with your Patent Action and Organ Pedals, and consider them worth double the money. Organists and organ students who desire to improve in the Art of Pedalling, which is so essential to a good organist, will do well to procure a set. I have seen no Action half so effective, and one can sit at the Piano and play, "Fixed in his everlasting seat," or any other organ music, or organ arrangement with the greatest pleasure. The touch of pedals could not be better, and the action is as you say, "Absolutely free from annoyances." They cannot be too highly recommended, as by their use, rapid progress is certain.—Believe me, sincerely yours,

I. B. Thornton,
Organist, Birstall, Leeds.

Cologne, July 16th, 1886.

My Dear Sir,—I have much pleasure in informing you that your Pedals have given the fullest satisfaction. I have them combined with my practice Piano. Many of my musical friends who have seen them, as well as my organ pupils, are quite delighted with them; and I must acknowledge that I have never met with any Pedals so noiseless and pleasant to play upon as yours. The Action I consider durable, and of very good workmanship. Every organist who desires to perfect his playing will welcome your invention. I can recommend your goods in every respect.—Yours truly,

Herr J. RODENKIRCHEN.

A FAILURE AND ITS LESSONS.

Some of the facts connected with the bankruptcy of the late lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre, briefly noticed in our columns last month, serve to point a lesson which has been illustrated time without number in the failures—not infrequently the periodical failures—of many less public-spirited and influential entrepreneurs both in London and the country. As that lesson is, with the exception of some £500, all that is left to the good against debts amounting to £40,000 odd, we need not be deterred from drawing attention to it by sympathy with a manager, the services rendered by whom, in the course of a varied and chequered career, are not likely to be forgotten. It may safely be said that the name of James Henry Mapleson will not by any possibility be ignored by future historians when tracing the progress of opera in England during the present century; and it will, above all, be associated with memorable performances of "Lohengrin," with Campanini and Titiens; of "Carmen," with Minnie Hauk; and of "Mefistofele," with Nilsson and Trebelli, not to mention the many meritorious, though less conspicuous, artists, whose introduction to this country has been due, in the first instance, to his quick perception of talent and keen managerial instinct. And not only was he a manager with strong opinions, but he was a manager who took risks, always willing to back his opinion with money of his own when he had it; and when the treasury was low, there were many about him ready enough to catch the infection of that sanguine spirit, which may be regarded as constituting at once the strength and the danger of the managerial temperament. For it has to be borne in mind that a manager is not the only speculative being in the world. It often happens that he is surrounded by a group of singers eager for public appearance, of costumiers, upholsterers, and others connected with the internal economy of a theatre, who, from their way of echoing his most flattering hopes, and the encouragement they lend to enterprises of a risky nature, might almost be supposed to prefer even an unsuccessful opera season to no season at all. In addition to these, no doubt there are many innocent sufferers—artists not well versed in the ways and hard facts of business, confiding tradespeople, and others attracted by the magnitude and outside glitter of important theatrical undertakings. To all but a select and shrewder minority, the mystery of the unknown, in which the question of a manager's capital is enshrouded until the day of reckoning comes, has in it something imposing and trust-inspiring. In this respect the system prevailing in England of conducting theatrical enterprise is certainly behind that of other countries, where a certain check is placed upon rash speculations by the habit of requiring from a manager a substantial deposit of caution money before accepting him as a lessee. Here, on the contrary, it is possible for anyone to undertake the responsibilities of most theatres, just as he would take a private house, with what results, in the lower branches of the profession, the unfortunate members of many a provincial company who have suddenly found themselves stranded and penniless, sometimes hundreds of miles away from their homes, will well be able to testify. In London, during the off season of last year, the actors engaged in one of the well-known minor theatres became victims to a similar fatality. Reverting to disasters on a larger scale, the reflection irresistibly occurs, that had some preliminary test of financial strength been insisted upon, memories would not be sore with the recollection of one disgraceful scene enacted at Her Majesty's Theatre, when orchestra, chorus, supers, and property men rose in open revolt on finding themselves shorn, in a manner they had by no means aspired to, by a money-lending hair-dresser of Brighton—or of the graceful levée Mr. Mapleson himself still more lately held in the vestibule of the same theatre, when, with characteristic resource, he offered to his supporters the return of their money, plus a gratuitous performance of "Carmen," by way of consolation for the non-appearance of a famous prima-donna. Neither, in all probability, would the affairs of their last-named manager have been allowed to drift into the desperate condition disclosed last month. In theatrical affairs, as well as in many others, genius for business and impecuniosity forms a dangerous combination. If before starting either of the speculations which led to his recent collapse, Mr. Mapleson had possessed, in solid cash, a capital of £30,000, it is quite conceivable that his most radiant anticipations might have been fulfilled; nor is it altogether beyond the bounds of possibility, having regard to his undoubted energy and fertility of resource, his long experience and numerous friends, that even now the future may have better things in store for him. Meanwhile, it may be said with regard to the present state of things, that the fault is to be attributed not so much to the individual, as to that utter nonchalance in dealing with theatrical affairs so characteristic of our Government wherever the interests of art are concerned.

Correspondence.

ST. ANDREWS UNIVERSITY AND MUSICAL DEGREES.

To the Editor of THE MUSICAL WORLD.

Edinburgh, April 30, 1888.

DEAR SIR,—You will be sorry to hear that my "Exercise" for the degree of Mus. Doc., St. Andrews, Fife, N.B., which you so kindly published in your last issue, has been rejected. The rejection was based upon the following grounds—a "Ground-Bass"—from the St. Andrews point of view:—

1. That the title of my opening chorus, "Invocation of the Doctorate," might either mean that the doctorate was invoked or did invoke; that, however, this double entendre, taken in connection with the fugal subject, "O, whistle, an' I'll come tae ye, my lad," left no room for doubt, but that a most unclassical joke had been perpetrated at the expense of the "reward of learned brows."

2. That the beast with seven horns—an instrument of the serpent class, whose "seeven" horns were also "sax"—was the proper bass of the bagpipe; and that nowhere had I employed that Silencer of Cerberus.

3. That the six Papal Bulls, granted to the University by Benedict XIII., were still "to the fore." That Papal Bulls, besides being of the deepest harmonic import, were, of necessity, canonical, and, therefore, of the highest contrapuntal value. (True-blue Protestants will doubtless "smell this rat, and nip it in the bud," another bull, added by way of free-part to the canon.) That my finale—a "Chorus of Thanksgiving to the Senate," which has evidently been rather premature—should have been built upon this "vasty deep" of scientific sonorosity. That, to a movement thus canonical, a cannon accompaniment might have been added out of compliment to Her Majesty's recent Jubilee, although, to be sure, as a leit-motive, this might possibly be rather heavy.

4. That I hadn't "blawn my ain trumpet lood enuff."

5. That I hadn't "peide the piper suffeeshently."

"Most musical, most melancholy" Senate! "I'll gang nae mair tae yon toun," but shall remain, dear sir, for ever yours,

JOHN GREIG,
Queen's College, Oxford.

PRESS NOTICES.

[The following communication is too characteristic to withhold from our readers. Being marked "this is for publication," we accordingly publish it just as we have received it. Ed. MUSICAL WORLD.]

To the Editor of THE MUSICAL WORLD.

DEAR SIR,—I have seen in your journal issued 21st inst., a notice of a concert given by Mr. George Leake, at Halstead, in Essex.

On that occasion I was the only vocalist, having consented to give my services merely for expenses, at the request of Mr. Hubert Armfield, the violinist of the concert party.

I stayed the night at the Rev. Mr. Armfield's Rectory, "Colne Engaine." At the concert, I received a most enthusiastic recall and encore, for one of my songs—and on my return to the rectory, with Mr. Armfield and family, during supper, I was told that few vocalists could stir an Essex audience, and I was congratulated on my success. Mr. Armfield, Senior, dilated largely on the utter worthlessness of press notices, as he asserted that all the press wanted, was "copy," and as he knew a good deal about the matter, I was to believe his assurances.

I observe in your paper, that you have evidently been supplied with "copy" from a source which is unfaithful and unfriendly to myself, and I shall feel obliged, as I do value and esteem press notices, if you will kindly insert this letter in your next week's edition, that Halstead folk may deny, if they can, the flattering and kind reception they gave me.—Yours faithfully,

M. CARLISLE.

Concerts.

MME. FRICKENHAUS'S RECITAL.

A recital was given on Saturday afternoon last, at Princes' Hall, by Mme. Frickenhaus, a lady who is well-known to frequenters of the "Pops." Mme. Frickenhaus's playing is devoid of any attempt at feats beyond the region of legitimate art; she treats the piano as a piano, and not as an instrument for developing the muscles, in which light some of the "blood and iron" pianists of modern times seem to regard it. Such playing is not only of intrinsic value, but also is worthy of remark, as showing what results a conscientious pianoforte player can accomplish. Her programme on this occasion was of wide range, and upon each item Mme. Frickenhaus brought to bear those artistic and technical qualities which have gained for her her present position.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The orchestral concert given last Saturday evening at St. James's Hall by the students of the Royal Academy of Music served its purpose in giving an opportunity to several promising pupils for displaying upon a concert platform, and before a large audience, the results of praiseworthy industry in their chosen art, and in some instances proofs of natural ability, upon the strength of which favourable anticipations for the future may fairly be founded. Praise of this kind is to be accorded to an orchestral idyl in MS. composed by Mr. H. Orsmond Anderton, a student of the Academy, entitled "Lancelot and Guinevere," and founded upon an episode in Tennyson's well-known poem of that name. To say that Mr. Anderton has successfully reflected in his music all the passion and movement conveyed in the Laureate's stirring lines would be to carry praise beyond the limits of fact. The composition, however, gives evidence of a gift of melody, and of an aptitude for orchestral writing such as justifies the encouragement that has been accorded to him by a performance of his work at one of these concerts. Among the vocalists, Miss Greta Williams, in an air of Mercadante; Miss Helen Haldane in Elizabeth's prayer from Tannhäuser; and Mr. Richard Green in a recitative and air from Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Prodigal Son," created a decidedly favourable impression. Mr. Ernest Kiver performed in a very creditable fashion the pianofore part in the "Allegro Affetuoso" from Schumann's A minor Concerto, and in Vieuxtemps' Violin Concerto in A, Miss Selina Cocks attacked with considerable spirit the difficulties of the rondo allegretto, and played the Adagio which preceded it with genuine feeling and excellent phrasing. Mr. Burnett officiated as conductor, and the concert on the whole fully sustained the standard and merits observable on former similar occasions.

THE POPULAR MUSICAL UNION.

"The Popular Musical Union," which gave an invitation concert at Grosvenor House last Saturday afternoon, is a reconstituted society, known originally as the Popular Ballad

Concert Association, established in 1882, with the object of fostering a taste for the higher forms of musical art among the masses of the East End. The scheme has been highly successful as regards the amount of educational work actually carried out, 40,000 persons being stated to have attended the concerts given in Whitechapel, Shoreditch, Clerkenwell, and Bermondsey, during the second season. Hitherto, however, it has left a pecuniary deficit, and an effort is now being made by the committee to remedy this, and at the same time to widen the scope of their disinterested labours. To this effort all musical amateurs with the power to help, will not fail to accord their hearty sympathy and support. During Saturday's concert satisfactory evidence was given of the progress already made by the East End choir and orchestra, under the guidance of the Society's conductor, Mr. W. H. Thomas, who, of course, officiated in that capacity on the present occasion, and there were added attractions in the shape of vocal pieces, contributed by Mrs. Arthur James, Madame Semon (née Raedecker), Mrs. Alexander Siemens, and Mr. Plunket Greene, and the performances upon the Mustel organ by Mr. J. M. Coward. At the end of the first part a short address was delivered by Mrs. Ernest Hart, explanatory of the new departure, and of the position and objects of the Society.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The last and a notable concert of their season was given by the Finsbury Choral Association, at Holloway Hall, on April 26th. Part first consisted of the overture and march from Mendelssohn's "Athalie" and Gounod's "Gallia," admirably rendered under the excellent conductorship of the esteemed musical director Mr. C. J. Dale. Part second was Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch," conducted by the composer. The principals were Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hilda Wilson, Messrs. Piercy, Watkin Mills, and Morgan Wilkinson. The band was complete and highly efficient. Sir Arthur Sullivan expressed himself in the very warmest terms with regard to the enthusiasm and admirable singing of the fine chorus of the Association. Mr. C. J. Dale and the society at large have indeed great reason to be proud of their well-earned success, and of the fact that they have secured to the north of London a truly admirable and useful society, able to present choral masterpieces with the best effect. The Finsbury Choral Association has a great career before it.

Mr. Zaverthal's Symphony in D minor was performed last Monday at the Princes' Hall, by the Royal Artillery Band, the composer conducting. As a full account has already appeared in these columns of Mr. Zaverthal's pleasing work, we need say no more than that it was fully appreciated by the numerous audience assembled.

Otto Hegner gave his orchestral concert on the same afternoon at St. James's Hall. His rendering of Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in C, from memory, was a wonderful feat for a boy. Mr. Cowen conducted.

A concert was given by the City School of Music, at the Lecture Hall, Old Bailey, on Tuesday evening last, by the kind permission of the Sunday School Union, when the students and friends of this popular middle class music school presented the following lengthy programme: Pianoforte solo, Impromptu in A flat (Schubert), Miss Beatrice Brown, pupil of Miss Leek; song, "Sigh no more, Ladies" (Sullivan), Mr. George Washington; song, "'Tis all that I can say" (Hope Temple), Miss B. Lewis; song, "Honour and Arms" (Handel), Mr. Edwin Carter; song, "The Garden of Sleep" (I. de Lara), Miss Maude Heywood, pupil of Mr. Grover; pianoforte solo, a "Verlust," b "Jagdstück" (Gurlitt), Mr. J. Baga, elementary pupil of Mr. Howson; song "Madoline" (Nelson), Mr. A. E. Berry, pupil of Mr. W. A. Frost; recitation, Mr. Edgar B. Skeet; song, "Caller Herrin (Anon), Miss C. E. Dowsett, pupil of Mr. Grover; pianoforte solo, a "La Fountaine Nocturne" (Henselt), b "Fantasie Impromptu" (Chopin), Miss E. Thomas, pupil of Miss Leek; song, "Eventide" (Planquette), Miss Emmie Spillman; song, "Only once more" (Moir), Mr. George Washington; flute solo, "Frühlingslied" (Mendelssohn), Mr. W. E. Browning, pupil of Mr. Howson; song, "Good-bye" (Tosti), Miss Lilian Young, pupil of Mr. Grover; song, "The Raft" (Pinsuti), Mr. Edwin Carter; pianoforte solo, a "The Harmonious Blacksmith" (Handel), b "Harvest Home" (A. C. Mackenzie), Miss Beatrice Brown; song, "Where-e'er you walk" (Handel), Miss Maude Heywood; recitation, Mr. Edgar B. Skeet. The playing of the pianoforte students gave evidence of careful training, Misses Brown and Thomas being especially good. Miss Heywood's songs were capitally sung and loudly applauded, as was also Mr. Carter's "Raft" and "Honour and Arms." Mr. Skeet, the elocutionist, was, as usual, very successful, and all the pupils who took part must be congratulated on their several performances. Mr. Grover accompanied throughout, and Messrs. Cramer's grand pianoforte was used. The evening classes at the school in Knightsbridge Street are now in full swing, and the list of subjects taught has been greatly enlarged. It is proposed also to inaugurate a series of lectures on musical subjects by some of the professors.

The members of the Tulse Hill Musical Society gave their final concert of the season 1887-8 on the 21st, at Gresham Hall, Brixton, under the conductorship of Dr. H. Walmesley Little. The first part of the programme was composed of Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus," the solos being admirably rendered by Madame Worrell, Messrs. H. Guy, and Robert Poole. The choruses as a whole were well and carefully performed by the Choir, although on one occasion there was some want of unity between the parts, owing probably to the organ and pianoforte not being strictly together. Mr. C. Jones presided at the former instrument, and Mr. Arundel Orchard at the latter. The second part was taken up with songs by each of the above soloists, and also by two lady members of the Society, Misses Harris and Malthouse. Mr. T. E. Gatehouse gave some excellent selections on the violin from Mendelssohn, &c., for which he received a well-deserved encore. Chopin's "Polonaise" was brilliantly rendered by Miss C. Bowditch, a promising pianist; and Gade's "Spring's Message" and two part songs brought the programme to a close.

A concert in aid of "The Parochial Mission Women's Fund," was given at the Portman Rooms, on the 26th ult., in the presence of a large audience, which included T.R.H. the Duchess of Albany and Princess Frederica. Mdlle. Marie de Lido, Mrs. Lenthal Swifte, Miss Georgina Ganz, Mdlle. Agnes Janson, Miss Eleanor Rees, Herr Niemann, Messrs. A. Jordan, Thorndike, and Bridson sang, and Mme. Frickenhaus, Mdlle. Henriette Murkens, and M. Libotton contributed instrumental solos. A feature of the concert was the violin playing of the Chevalier de Salas, an gentleman of colour, and violinist to the late Emperor of Germany.

The Society of Cymmrodorion announced a lecture by Mr. Joseph Bennett, on "The Possibilities of Welsh Music," on the the evening of the 25th. A special choir was engaged to sing a selection of Welsh music. The ticket, unfortunately, did not arrive in time to be of use.

The Handel Society gave, at Portman Rooms, on Friday evening the 27th, a performance of "Samson," to a special audience composed of working girls. But little professional assistance was engaged for the orchestra, none whatever for the chorus, and even the soli were sung by amateurs. Of these, the lady who undertook the part of Micah was perhaps the most successful, displaying a fine contralto voice, and delivering the music with much expression. The tenor soloist sang well, but with too weak a voice in the part of the hero. Mr. Frank Pownall's rendering of the bass soli was, on the whole, very satisfactory, but the soprano was overweighted with her task. The choruses and accompaniments would have been better for more rehearsals.

The Musical Artists' Society opened their concert of Saturday evening with an in memoriam performance of Sir George Macfarren's quartet in G. The rest of the programme consisted of pieces by living English composers, a clever sonata for violin and piano well played by M. Buzian and Mr. W. H. Speer, being followed by an even more interesting piano and violoncello sonata by Mr. Abdy Williams, played with masterly vigour by Messrs. Algernon Ashton and B. Albert. A string quartet, very difficult, but distinguished by much musicianly feeling, by Dr. Creser, closed the list of instrumental pieces. Of the songs, Gerard Cobb's "County Guy" and "Bird upon the branch" are enough to stamp that composer as a refined and talented lyrical writer, while Miss Millington Synge's "Time and Eternity" is a successful song of the descriptive ballad order. We understand that it is an early effort, but it is pleasant to note that, in spite of the somewhat old-fashioned form of the song, Miss Synge has not given way to the fault which so often mars similar compositions, that of repeating the words and phrases. Two duets, by Dr. C. Vincent, were given by the fresh young voices of Mr. Stedman's choir. It was curious to see a "Sailor's lullaby" (of a transcendant sweetness undreamt of, we are sure, by most hardy sons of the sea), and a "Holiday Song," delivered with equally stolid and expressionless faces by these excellent little singers.

PROVINCIAL.

BIRMINGHAM, April 23.—Mr. Charles Banks at a moment's notice filled the place of Mr. Edward Lloyd (who was suffering from a relaxed throat) at Mr. Stockley's last orchestral subscription concert on Thursday. A considerable amount of excitement was caused by this announcement, and personal friends, as well as those interested in matters musical affecting our town, gathered in force to hear our townsman, who has already won good opinions in London and elsewhere, and who has been honoured by an engagement for our approaching festival. Mr. Banks suffered somewhat from fatigue, having travelled the same day from Plymouth to Birmingham, but notwithstanding a slight hoarseness he created a most favourable impression; his voice and method have considerably improved, and the anticipations formed of him have been fully verified. He was loudly re-called after each song. Madame Helen Trust was the lady vocalist. Her best efforts were in Grieg's "Solveig's Lied," which was charmingly sung. We have so often spoken in these columns of the great advance which Mr. Stockley's orchestra has made, and each concert gives fresh proof of the excellent standard our local orchestra has attained. Mendelssohn's "Italian symphony," as well as his "Melusina Overture," were given under Mr. Stockley's bâton with consummate finish, precision, and artistic conception. The delicacy of the strings was fully brought out in two charming melodies, opus 34, by Grieg. These melodies are orchestral arrangements by the composer's own hand of two of his songs, "Hgertesar" ("wounded heart") and "Varen" ("spring,") and were heard for the first time in England at Mr. Henschel's St. James's Hall Symphony Concert on the 15th of November last. Mr. J. T. Carrodus appeared as solo violinist, playing Molique's Concerto in A minor, op. 21, and Paganini's violin solo on the fourth string, founded upon the well-known prayer, "Dal tuo Stellato." Our foremost English violin virtuoso was in excellent form, and has never been heard here to greater advantage. His tone and technique quite astounded the large audience, and he was greeted with overwhelming enthusiasm. Our musical season has now reached the inevitable "finale," and we are already looking eagerly forward to the forthcoming Triennial Festival. Miss Fanny Davies announces a pianoforte recital for Thursday. The répertoire comprises examples from the best masters, particulars of which will be given in my next notice.—O.P.

BOURNEMOUTH.—The most complete successes of Signor La Camera's series of Oratorio Concerts, were the two performances on the 18th April of Gounod's "Redemption." The chorus and band under Signor La Camera's conductorship, acquitted themselves of their task in a highly creditable manner, the precision with which the effective number "Unfold ye Portals" was given by the chorus, and the steady playing of the instrumentalists, led by Mr. Carrodus, in the prologue and the March to Calvary, being especially noticeable. Miss Sophie Robertson (Mrs. Stanley Stubbs) was the soprano soloist, and gave a very sympathetic reading of the air, "From thy love." Madame Bolingbroke at the last moment supplied the place of Madame Patey, who was prevented by indisposition from carrying out her engagement, and Miss Thresher, of Bournemouth, rendered valuable assistance in the concerted music. Mr. William Nicholl sang the tenor recitatives and arias to perfection, and Mr. Kingsley, the bass, was effective in the music which fell to his share.

MANCHESTER, April 24.—There is very little to notice this week. On Saturday, April 21, a special Workman's Concert took place at the Free Trade Hall. The programme was of a very popular character, but the large audience probably appreciated it none the less on that account. M. Brossa, a well-known member of Mr. Hallé's orchestra, contributed two admirable solos on the flute; and a pianoforte fantasia on "Carmen," was competently rendered by Miss Duxbury. The vocalists were numerous and well received. Amongst the most successful must be mentioned Miss Conway, Miss Olga Battaglia, and Mr. Cuthbert Blacow. Operatic selections were excellently given by one of the brass bands in which Lancashire abounds so freely—this one from Bess o th' Barns. Two comic operas were presented to the Manchester public last week. At the Prince's, "La Bearnaise"—very poor, but well staged, and the parts, as a whole, well played by Agnes de la Porte and her company. At the Comedy, "Rhoda;" also very poor.

EDINBURGH, Monday, April 30th.—On Saturday evening the Car Opera Company terminated a highly successful six nights' engagemen at the Lyceum Theatre. On Saturday morning a performance of Mozart' "Marriage of Figaro" was given, with Mr. Leslie Crotty in the role o Figaro. The part of Susanna was admirably rendered by Miss Kat Drew, that of Cherubino was entrusted to Madame Marie Roze, wh appeared in it to considerable advantage. Owing to indispositio Madame Georgina Burns was unable to appear, and in her stead Mis Lily Crabtree was the Countess, and met with great favour. Mr. F. H Celli made a very good Count. The other parts received justice fro the hands of Messrs. Aynsley Cook, W. Esmond Campbell, and Mis Annie Cook. In the evening "The Bohemian Girl" was given, wit Miss Fanny Moody as Arline, and met with a hearty reception. Th other parts were well sustained by Messrs. John Child (Thaddeus), M Max Eugene (The Count), Mr. Aynsley Cook (Devilshoof), and Mis Jennie Dickerson (Queen of the Gipsies). On leaving the theatre large crowd followed Miss Moody's carriage to her residence, and i response she stepped out on the balcony and sang "Home, Swee Home."

GLASGOW, May 1st.—Senor Sarasate, the world-renowned violinis gave a concert last night in the Queen's Rooms before a large an fashionable audience. In all he played six pieces, viz., "Suite f Violin" (J. Raff), "Concerto for Violin" (Wieniawski), "Ballade (new Moczkowski), "Rondo Capriccioso" (Saint-Saëns), and a Bole and "Muineira" (La Moulinière) of his own. At the close of th concert he was repeatedly recalled, but declined to play. Sen Sarasate was assisted by Herr Schönberger, who presided at the pian forte for the first time in Glasgow, and during the evening played thre pianoforte solos (a) "Barcarolle" (Rubinstein), (b) "Moto Perpetuo (Godowski) first time, and "Valse Brillante," A flat (Chopin), and i response to a hearty encore a "Tarantelle," by Moczkowski."—E.J.R.

Facts and Comments.

The English translation of the correspondence between Wagner and Liszt is now finished and in type, and the publication of the book may be looked forward to within a week or ten days. It will be in two volumes, and the translator has added a preface.

The first address of the new Principal of the Royal Academy of Music to the students, of which we print a large portion in another column, contains much that will be useful to young musicians. At the French Institute it is the duty of every new "immortal" to sketch the life and sing the praises of his immediate predecessor, and to that Academic precedent Mr. Mackenzie did ample justice by paying a most generous tribute to the late Sir George Macfarren, "to whom," he remarked, "the Royal Academy owes its present position and prosperity. As one of a line of distinguished men who have held the Principalship here, his name will be honoured, his memory will endure and be kept green so long as this Institution stands." All this and much more does credit to the heart of Mr. Mackenzie, but will, of course, not prevent him from making such reforms and alterations in his predecessor's system as he will think necessary.

The many friends of Madame Sembrich will learn with regret that her stay at San Remo has not been attended by the improvement in her health which had been hoped for, and consequently that the more immediate engagements for England, including two concerts announced to be given by her this summer, will have to be abandoned.

Mr. Ambrose Austin's impending benefit concert at St. James's Hall will be honoured by the presence of Her Royal Highness the Princess Christian.

We print in another column the final debate in the House of Lords on the Musical Copyright Bill—not on account of any special wisdom displayed by any of the "noble" and even less by any of the "learned" lords, than as a matter of curiosity. Music is generally treated with so much contempt by official England, that a debate of some length in the upper house of our legislature dealing with the divine art, deserves notice in a musical paper. Moreover, the result of that debate may be summed up in the words "All's well that ends well." In spite of the ridiculous objections of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Bramwell, the Bill passed through Committee, and will soon be the law of the land. "Harry Wall's" occupation will be gone, but he takes into private life the proud consciousness of having conspicuously figured in this discussion, and of having, in a manner, had two noble and learned lords for his mouthpieces.

A telegram was received in London on Monday announcing that the Etruria had safely arrived at New York on the morning of that day with Messrs. Lloyd and Vert on board. The dolphin whom we placed at the disposal of those gentlemen in case of need, was therefore not required. With regard to that musical fish, several letters by bewildered subscribers have reminded us of the story told by the late Mr. Davison, with great gusto, according to which Mr. Boosey, in the early days of the MUSICAL WORLD, said, imploringly, to the late John Oxenford, "Please remember that all our intellectual readers are on the free list." Our puzzled correspondents had evidently never heard of one of the most beautiful myths of antiquity. Let them consult their Lemprière where, under the heading "Arion," they will find that that famous singer being on board ship with a great treasure gained by his art, excited the cupidity of the sailors, who threatened to throw him overboard. As a last favour, he asked that he might be allowed to sing once more before he died. Standing on the prow of the vessel, he accordingly struck his lyre, and poured forth his soul in song, after which he threw himself into the sea. But a dolphin having been attracted by the sound of his voice, took Arion on his back, and carried him safely home. Here, by the way, is a fine subject for a cantata.

"The project of establishing in Paris a third lyric theatre seems to be gradually assuming definite shape; and there is good reason to welcome it, considering the present state of musical affairs in France, as shown on the one hand by the low state to which grand opera has sunk, and on the other by the exile of the Opéra Comique. A lyrical theatre, under a management animated by a really artistic spirit, may be assured beforehand of success, and the time for such a theatre has fully arrived. In the interest of music in Paris, it may be hoped that its advent will not be delayed." Thus says our contemporary, Le Ménestrel, and coming from such a source these charges suggest reflections of a serious nature, and revive once more many vexed questions connected with State-subventioned theatres.

The discussion of such questions is by no means confined to France, and in the Italian press we read of bitter complaints against a system which, in its practical working, seems to tend rather to the filling of singers' pockets than to the spread of artistic culture. Views such as these have been emphasised by the action of Verona, Venice, and Rome herself in refusing or reducing the amounts previously granted.

AN important arrest was made on Sunday on board the Guion Royal Mail steamship Nevada, which had arrived in Queenstown harbour to embark passengers before proceeding to New York. A young musician named Charles Rowe, who had assumed another name, was discovered among the saloon passengers, with a young wife to whom he had been married only one week. Sergeant Harland, a Leeds detective, took him into custody on the charge of having fraudulently disposed of a number of valuable pianos which he had hired out, on the instalment system, from Mr. W. H. Waddington, piano warehouse, Leeds, to the amount of £400. Mr. Waddington had accompanied the detective for identification. The charge having been made known to the accused man, a painful scene ensued. The young wife sobbed and cried as her husband was being taken away by the detective officers to the steam tender in waiting alongside the ship, and she watched her husband being taken ashore to stand his trial for fraud while she was being conveyed to sea on board the liner for New York.

Mr. Hamish M'Cunn announces two orchestral concerts to be given in the studio of Mr. John Pettie, R.A., at St. John's Wood, on May 30th and June 27th. He will be supported by a band of forty performers selected from Mr. Manns's Crystal Palace orchestra, who, among other things, will give performances of several new works by the promising young Scottish composer. It is hoped that these concerts may turn out to have self-propagating attributes, and that the profits derived from this first experiment will be sufficient to secure a fund for establishing other similar concerts.

Messrs. Munton and Morris write from 95A, Queen Victoria Street:—"Our attention has been drawn to the Times of Tuesday, in which, after speaking of 'heavy' pecuniary loss suffered by all managers last year, it is intimated that there will be only one Italian Opera this season. Permit us to say as to our client Signor Lago, who was lessee of Covent Garden for 1886-7 (and who was abroad when the house was taken this year), that we are unaware of any heavy pecuniary loss on his part, whatever may have been the case with others; and, let us add, that, so far from its being certain that Covent Garden will be the only opera this year, many recent and urgent communications have taken place with St. Petersburg, by letter and telegram, as to securing a London theatre for opera, either now or later, at which Signor Lago proposes to produce "Otello," and other novelties, with Masini, the tenor, who has achieved such popularity in the Russian capital, under our client's auspices." Credat Judœas Apella.

The Athenæum of this week, noting the very successful tour which the young Scottish pianist, Mr. Frederic Lamond, has just been making in Germany, reports that the German critics spoke "highly of his abilities, both as a pianist and a composer." This gives the reader no idea of how very enthusiastic the German critics were, and what an event it is in the annals of British music, for a British pianist to be placed by the official Reichsanzeiger, of Berlin, in the first rank of living performers, and to have a mighty future as a composer predicted for him. Considering that Germany is Chauvinistic to the core, especially in musical matters, and has long cherished the principle that no music can ever come out of England, the triumph of Mr. Lamond is all the greater. On his return to England, Mr. Lamond will give a very extensive series of recitals—forty concerts, it is said.

Miss Ethel Patey, the only daughter of Mr. and Madame Patey, and herself a painter of talent, is engaged to be married to Mr. Phillips, of Farningham.

A new publication, "Our Celebrities," will shortly be issued by Messrs. Swan, Sonnenschein & Co. It is intended to publish every month three large portraits, with biographical notices, from the pen of Dr. Louis Engel. The celebrities are not, as might be supposed, exclusively or chiefly of the musical kind, although it may be hoped that the worshippers of the divine art will receive their due share of attention.

Mr. McGuckin returned to town on Saturday, having crossed the "pond" in the Umbria. He looks as well and cheerful as ever, and is full of his American experiences—not all of them very pleasant, but all of them very interesting. Of the splendour with which such operas as "Lohengrin," Rubinstein's "Nero," and Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba," are got up on the other side, we have, he says, no notion in this country.

The inaugural ode written for the opening of the Glasgow Exhibition by Messrs. Robert Buchanan and Mackenzie, was performed on Monday in the presence of the Prince and Princess of Wales, the composer conducting.

The inaugural hymn composed for the opening of the Italian Exhibition by Signor Tito Mattei, has been dedicated, by permission, to the Prince of Naples. The work is written for soprano solo, chorus, and orchestra, and Madame Nordica will be the soloist.

The whole first part of the third concert of the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society was given up to Wagner's works, including that master's youthful symphony. Nikita sang "Elsa's Dream" in German, with admirable dramatic expression, and Mr. Bernard Lane essayed the air, "Dost thou not breathe?" from the same opera. A new Silver Wedding March, brilliantly scored by Mr. W. G. Cusins, closed a well-planned and enjoyable concert. Mr. George Mount was the conductor.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Mr. Mackenzie delivered his inaugural address as Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, on Saturday afternoon. After paying a warm tribute to the late Principal, and also to Mr. Walter Bache, Mr. Mackenzie spoke as follows:—

It was the habit of your late Principal to address you from time to time on general and special subjects in connection with your musical training. I intend to follow his example, so far as my more modest abilities in this line, one for which he was peculiarly fitted, will permit me to do. In one of his early addresses to the students I find the following remarks: "We come not here to learn a specialty—you to learn an instrument, you to learn to sing, you to learn to compose: we come here to learn music—we come here to study the several branches of one tree."

We have here, laid down very clearly in one tersely worded sentence, the lines upon which we ought to work; for while you each separately give your chief attention to certain studies of your choice for which nature has perhaps particularly gifted you, we must not forget that your interest in the art may not begin and end in them. What are technically called "second studies" are actually of very great importance. That musician is but poorly equipped who sets out on his career in the character of a "one-sided specialist." The vocalist's taste and feeling must be improved by an intimate knowledge of the instrumental works of the great masters; and, again, your instrumentalist is but half prepared for his work if he have not a knowledge of the glorious catalogue of compositions of which the human voice is the chief interpreter. The most prominent musicians of our day are just those whose interest in music is universal and extends to her every branch, those who sympathise with and appreciate all that is good in every class of musical literature. I would specially warn you against the cultivation of one particular school of composition, to the exclusion of others which undoubtedly have a just claim on your attention. I do not believe, though some would fain have us think it, that the present generation is more culpable in this respect than any former one. The means for the expression of opinion are more numerous, the intercourse between musicians of different nationalities is more easy, and consequently opinions are exchanged more frequently, but not with more warmth than was customary in the days of Gluck and Piccini. Our opportunity for hearing modern compositions are now so frequent, that the want of knowledge of the various schools of composition cannot be excused on any ground whatever. The days of the conductor who limits his influence to assisting the growth of one particular school of music are, I hope, numbered, and the musician whose narrow-mindedness causes him to persist in running in one groove must not hope to gain notice or win the esteem of his fellows. To the progress of the student such a narrowness of procedure is indeed highly detrimental. There is as much knowledge of the art of instrumentation to be gained from the perusal of the score of an opera by Mozart or Auber as from the study of a score of Beethoven or Berlioz, or of any of the great musical thinkers of our own day; and I would counsel you to seek the good which is undoubtedly to be found in the music of all schools, wherever they hail from, and to add to your general knowledge of the art by every possible means. Naturally we have in ourselves, and this especially in our riper years, certain predilections and tastes which cause us to draw nearer to some particular authors; but these tastes ought never to prevent us from giving proper attention to new music which may at first seem strange, unfamiliar, or even unsympathetic to us. It appears to me that the great charm of our art is that its modes of expression, depending as they do upon individualities, are practically inexhaustible, and hence of ever-varying but constant interest.

And now let me say a word or two with reference to your position as students in this Academy. The benefits you derive by virtue of your studying your future profession collectively cannot be over-estimated, and it is in your own power to make these advantages doubly valuable by cultivating that unanimity of aim, that love of Alma Mater, for which this place has always been celebrated. You may form friendships, artistic and social, which shall last throughout your lifetime—you have the opportunity of forming an opinion of the talents and judging of th work done by your fellow students at the concerts and fo nightly meetings. Each of you separately may assist t progress of others by sharing your knowledge of musical a general subjects. It is also in your hands that the future of th school is to a great extent placed, and I wish you to realise th to the full. When you leave us, to pursue your plans for yo advancement in life, and to undertake the duties for which y are now preparing yourselves, you will each figure as representative of the work done in this place. Y cannot all, it is true, expect to be equally succes ful. Some will carry with them the tangible proofs their superior excellence, some must be content to see t longed-for prize allotted to another. Many more will have be satisfied with the knowledge that they have done their be But all of you will, I hope, remember that the honour of t R.A.M. is in your hands, and that you must bear it brave aloft in after years. I need hardly, I know, remind my c leagues here, who devote their energies to you, that the duti and obligations are mutual. It is their privilege to stamp the artistic impress upon you, as new coins to be issued from a Roy Mint. You will remember your professors in after years as t artists and men who gave you currency and prepared you f circulation; their responsibilities are, if possible, even great than your own. I will go further. I speak as one of them, a may take it upon myself to answer for them. We hope th you will remember us in future days, not only as masters, b as friends, whose interest in you and your future work is lasti and permanent.

The arrangements for the carrying on of your studies he have occupied the attention of many eminent musicians in t past, and have been systematically built up and gradually pe fected during a long period of years. To those men, notably the late Sir George Macfarren, we owe the present efficie working state and power of the machinery here; and it seen to me that we should be paying but a poor tribute to the memories were we not to follow the example which they ha set, were we to look upon their work with careless acceptanc and were we to neglect to carry it on in the same spirit in whic they themselves laboured. There is no such thing as standi still. The progress of music is rapid, and we must not on keep pace with the onward movement, but place ourselves, to speak, in the front, and endeavour to be the very leaders its march. There is now, and I am glad to say it, more tha one sister institution working in company with us in the sam field; and the flourishing condition in which we see them is proof—if any such be required—that music has at last obtaine her recognised and honoured place among the arts in th country. Let us share the work with these sister institutio in that spirit of amicable emulation which aids the rise an strengthens the position of every art or science. The mould in which we were originally cast may differ in form, shape, an size; our methods of carrying on our work may invite con parison; but we know that contrast is a strongly desirab element in music. Its absence deliberately invokes that ev spirit who sits on the throne of the Kingdom of Boredom, an whose name is Dulness. The goal is reached all the quicke when the competitors are skilful, strong, and numerous, an the great end will be attained all the sooner if we keep in min one of the first doctrines of harmony—that the so-called common chord is the most satisfactory and perfect of them all.

THE COPYRIGHT (MUSICAL COMPOSITIONS) BILL

The House of Lords went into Committee upon this Bill on Friday, last week.

On Clause 1 (provision as to damage),

Lord Bramwell moved to omit the clause which proposed to alter the laws relating to dramatic literary property by limiting the penalty or damages to be awarded upon any action or proceedings in respect of an unauthorised representation of any musical composition to such sum less than 40s. as should in the discretion of the Court be reasonable. By the law as it stood at present if a man composed a song he had the exclusive right of representation as regarded it. That was a right which the composer should sell and which was frequently sold for hard cash. This Bill proposed to take away that existing right from those who had composed songs, or from those who had purchased the right of representation, and—let there be no mistake about it—the Bill proposed to that without giving any compensation whatever to the persons so to be deprived of their rights. He challenged the noble and learned lord the late Lord Chancellor to deny the truth of that statement. The noble and learned lord had read the names of a number of distinguished persons—his own among them not being the least distinguished—who recommended the alteration in the law which the Bill proposed to effect, and the noble and learned lord asked whether anyone would suppose that such distinguished persons would recommend such an attack as this clause was described to be upon property being made. For his own part he should not have supposed that the noble and learned lord himself would have recommended such an attack as this being made upon property, but the fact was that the noble and learned lord and the other distinguished persons had done so, and therefore there was no supposition about the matter, because it was a fact. It was not the seriousness of the attack upon property that he complained of—it was the precedent which it was now proposed to make which might by-and-bye be relied upon as a ground for more serious attacks upon property. He did not know that a paltry piece of spoliation ought not to be equally resisted with a more substantial one. If a man picked his pocket of a pocket handkerchief he was a low thief, but he ought to be punished as well as the man who effected a more substantial robbery. Then there was his noble—he would not say his learned—friend, because a man appeared to cease to be a lawyer when he became a statesman ("Hear, hear," and laughter), the Colonial Secretary, whose proposals savoured more of the statesman than of the lawyer. His noble friend was very fond of popularity, which was more likely to be gained by supporting this Bill than in opposing it. His noble friend had referred to the case of a Mr. Wall, who, he said, had charged a dear little girl of 13 years of age £2 for singing a copyright song at a concert for charitable purposes. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.)

Lord Knutsford said that he had not made the statement, which had been made by another noble and—probably the noble and learned lord opposite would admit—learned lord. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.)

The Earl of Onslow said that he had made the statement the noble and learned lord referred to. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.)

Lord Bramwell remarked that he would finish with the noble and learned lord the Secretary for the Colonies before he proceeded to anything else. The noble and learned lord said that Sir A. Sullivan and Messrs. Boosey approved of this clause. No one could speak without respect of Sir A. Sullivan, but he would venture to say that Sir A. Sullivan approved of this measure because he knew nothing about it. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) Messrs. Boosey were very respectable people, but they did not oppose this clause because they were musical publishers, and the more songs were sung the more copies of them they sold. Doubtless Messrs. Boosey, therefore, would sooner pay a person £2 for singing a song than charge him £2 for his singing. The evidence of Messrs. Boosey, therefore, respectable though they no doubt were, was worthless as regarded the present matter. He challenged the noble lord the Secretary for the Colonies to deny that this clause proposed to take away a right without giving any compensation for it. With regard to the dear little girl of 13 who sung a song for charity, it was a question whether she had sung for charity or for the pleasure of hearing her own voice, or to contribute to the pleasure of her parents and friends, which had, no doubt, much more to do with the matter than charitable motives. Still, if he had been the proprietor of the song and he had been told that it had been sung for charity, he was not at all sure that he should have asked for the £2. He said that he was not at all sure that he should have done so advisedly, because if a man permitted his songs to be sung for charity without demanding payment, he might part with all the value of his property. On the other hand, however, if he had been the father of this dear little girl, and he had heard that a demand had been made for the payment of this £2, he should have paid what, after all, was only a just debt. The noble and learned earl near him seemed to approve of the Bill, and as he had challenged others, he challenged the noble and learned earl to deny that this clause proposed to take away a right without any compensation being given in respect of it. This was not a question of alteration of procedure alone, it was taking away a substantial right. No doubt it was a small matter, but a bad precedent was established by the Bill, and would be applied in other cases. He should not deal with the provisions of the Bill in detail, but he would submit to their lordships that the Bill took away a right without pretending to give an equivalent for it, and he would challenge the noble and learned lord the late Lord Chancellor, the noble lord the Secretary for the Colonies, or the noble and learned earl beside him to contradict the description he had given of the measure.

The Earl of Selborne observed that as the noble and learned lord had good-humoredly challenged him to reply, he would state shortly the reasons which induced him to disagree with his noble and learned friend on this matter. In saying that a right of property was taken away without an equivalent being given, what did his noble and learned friend mean by "a right of property"? What he called a "right of property" was clearly the claim given by the statute to any person proceeding for the infringement of a song to minimum damages of 40s. If that were what the noble and learned lord called a "right of property," it was a very peculiar description to apply to a mere regulation by Parliament interfering with the legitimate function of a jury to assess damages that the minimum damages for the infringement of the Act should be 40s.

Lord Herschell expressed his concurrence with the views of the noble and learned earl. His noble and learned friend had observed that neither Sir A. Sullivan nor Mr. Boosey knew anything about this question. In this case those who wrote the music, those who wrote the words, and those who dealt in both agreed in seeing nothing to object to in this Bill. Only one solitary individual objected. In his opinion, this Bill did not take away any right of property. The right of property given by the statute was the right of exclusive representation of the song—that no person was to be at liberty with impunity to perform it. But not every remedy given by the statute was part of the right of property. This Bill did not take away the right to sue for infringement of copyright, it only abolished the right to minimum damages and left the whole question of damages to the decision of the court. Was the Legislature, because it had once fixed a minimum of damages, to be bound for all time to continue that measure of damages? Was the Legislature bound to hold to that measure of damages when it was shown that it worked injustice, and that the best course was to leave the measure of damages to the tribunal? He believed that this Bill took away no right of property.

The Lord Chancellor agreed that there was some slight doubt whether they were not confusing things with words. What was called a right of property no doubt was incapable of exact definition, and yet everybody well knew what it meant. One incident of a right of property was that its possessor could enforce it and thus make it of some value to himself. The particular thing with which their lordships were dealing was the right of exclusive representation, and it was to be observed that that right which was sought to be fenced round by the Legislature was the right of representation on each particular occasion. The general right of copyright or the right to multiply copies was sufficiently protected by law already. But doubtless the Legislature in passing the Act which it was now sought to repeal foresaw that it would probably be impossible for a person to give evidence applicable to the particular injury done to him on a particular occasion. The right with which they were now dealing was the right of single representation, and a jury would probably say they could not assess the damage done in respect of each representation. The Legislature, in order to get rid of that difficulty, thought it right to fix the minimum amount of damages in order to prevent these representations being made without the sanction of the author. As it was competent for the Legislature to pass that Act so they might now amend it, but he thought it desirable that those who insisted on the alteration should show their lordships why the owners of this kind of property should be left without protection. He would suggest that the judge should have a discretion in awarding costs, and that the amount of the penalty should remain as at present. Deep as was his respect for the Commission he must vote for the noble and learned lord if he brought this matter to a division.

Earl Granville remarked that the lawyers did not all give them the same advice, and therefore he should prefer to look at this question from the point of view of a common juryman. If, as the noble and learned lord said, the Judge would be able to assess the amount of costs, he did not see why the jury should not be able to assess the amount of damages.

The Earl of Onslow pointed out that in the evidence given before the Commission it was stated by a music publisher, who was well qualified to judge, that he did not believe any living composer had derived sixpence profit from the performance of his songs. That was the kind of property which the noble lord said would be taken away by this Bill—property which had never been worth sixpence to its owner. The way in which the cumulative penalty worked this great hardship was best illustrated by the evidence of another music publisher. An agent said, "I understand that you have purchased the copyright of a song." It was not a classical production, but the song was popular. It was called "Tommy make room for your uncle." (Laughter.) The agent went on to say, "Do not attempt to recover penalties for one or two performances, but wait till the pantomimes are in full swing, and you will then have an opportunity to recover numerous penalties and to put £200 into your pocket." The object of the Bill was to prevent such an abuse as that.——The clause was then agreed to. The other clauses were also agreed to, and the Bill passed through Committee.

VOCAL MUSIC.

There are some interesting features in five songs by Charles C. Bethune (Reid Bros.), in the case of three of which—"Memory" (words by Christina Rossetti), "I would not know," "O love whose life to me most dear"—the composer appears to have aimed not so much at melodic symmetry, as at an appropriate and declamatory rendering of the always good verses he has chosen. This he has done cleverly, and in several instances with excellent effect; but he must not be disappointed if appreciation of these songs is restricted to singers with a taste for something rather out of the common. Of the remaining two—"Singing in the Hawthorn," and "En passant"—the first is the best. Both are short and strophic in character, but the melodies are of but moderate interest, and the composer is not so successful in his endeavour to write in a sprightly vein. "Proud Maisie" (Stanley Lucas and Co.), is a musicianly and effective setting of Sir Walter Scott's verses by Moir Clark, who shows both in the voice part and in the admirably harmonised accompaniments, that he has managed to extract veritable inspiration from the weird ditty of Madge Wildfire. "The Lark," by Jessie Batterill (same publishers), is more conventional in character, but rather above the ordinary drawing-room song. Of two settings of words by Burns, by J. Jaques Haakman, "Sae far awa'" and "A rosebud by my early walk" (Charles Woolhouse) both are well written, but the first claims preference as regards originality. Here the peculiar close of each verse upon the tonic minor seventh, not resolved in the accompaniment until the voice part has ceased, gives really admirable expression to the words "far awa'." The same publishers send "Twilight visions," a musicianly song by Herbert F. Sharpe, and "The Magyars' Home," a song of some character with a rhythmical swing in it, by G. Saint George. Vocalists in search of a really bright nautical ditty will find it in "The Union Jack," by A. W. Constantine (Wm. Dunkley). "What matters it how we die?" the cheerful title of a song by U. R. Jones (London Music Publishing Company), propounds a question of so entirely personal and delicate a nature, that we are inclined to doubt its convivial effect when warbled in a drawing-room to music of a commonplace, mock-sentimental type. On the whole, however, the character of songs lately sent to us shows, with some exceptions, a distinct advance upon those of former seasons.

THE THIN END OF THE WEDGE.

To the Editor of The Musical World.

Sir.—As a concert-goer of many years' standing, able and willing to pay for such musical entertainment as suits my taste, but not rich enough to scan with indifference the prices of admission announced in preliminary bills, I have had an opportunity of watching, with mingled feelings, the whole process of getting in a wedge, from the careful insertion of its thin edge to the final blow by which it is driven home. Many besides myself can call to mind the halcyon time when a neatly-printed programme, handed to you civilly and gratis at the door of the concert-room, gave all the information necessary for following the course of a performance. Presently some enemy to amateurs of limited means invented the book of words and analytical programme, and the latter, as a means of extending musical culture and increasing the enjoyment of the high-class chamber-concerts at which, I believe, they were first introduced, was, it must be acknowledged, fairly worth the extra sixpence charged for it in that instance. But little did persons in my position, who hailed its advent with contentment, dream that this was the thin end of the wedge—the first step in an ingenious contrivance for practically raising the price of each seat by sixpence, or, in latter days, more generally a shilling. In many cases, the "analysis" is now conspicuous by its absence, and you are offered for a shilling—that is, for a sum sufficient to pay for a complete novel by Sir Walter Scott, or a railway "dreadful," or a visit to the panorama, or numberless other small luxuries—a trumpery selection of doggrel verses that have served to inspire the genius of various popular song-writers of the day. We are all familiar by this time with the disgusted look of the attendant, generally laden with a pile of green books, when asked for a simple programme. Either they are "all gone" before the room is a quarter filled, or they were never printed; and recent observations confirm me in the impression that there is a deliberate plot among concert-givers to withdraw the programme altogether, and replace it by their precious book, thus compelling us to pay more money merely to be informed what it is we have already paid for. I think the time has come when all musical amateurs, including those to whom the money question is of little or no consequence, should, on public grounds, make a firm stand against this monstrous imposition; and in this they will be heartily joined by, Sir, your most obedient servant,

The Organ World.

XIV.

In passing from a very imperfect consideration of Bach's organ music, a strong feeling of reluctance at leaving so large a subject after such insufficient treatment is somewhat moderated by the hope that time and opportunity will presently permit a more lengthy and separate consideration of that great master's work as a writer for the instrument.

Another great figure of the first half of the eighteenth century, Handel, claims attention in connection with organ recital playing. Though one might hesitate about assigning to Handel the honour of the invention of the suite for organ and orchestra, or organ concerto, he undoubtedly first secured lasting popularity for that form. There are distinct differences with regard to the conditions under which the two contrapuntal giants of the epoch now being spoken of, laboured as writers of organ music. These differences were in their nature as men even more than as artists, in the instruments they had to deal with, and in the opportunities for the employment and display of their talents and skill as organists. Bach's thoughtful, studious, and retiring nature led him to devote his energies and life to music from a strictly artistic point of sight. Handel was more business-like in his views of art work; indeed his well-defined shrewdness, self-respect, and commercial views of the possibility of his career were developed with a keenness which, in the case of a man of less-powerful mind and gifted with a smaller sense of personal control, would have taken the form of a pronounced selfishness. He rarely forgot himself or his own interest; and, despite his genius, he had in all his work "a keen eye for the main chance," an anxiety for popularity which almost amounted to an insatiable greed. Thus we find no display music he wrote so cunningly devised for the elevation of personality as the music he wrote for his own performance, and his desire for individual presentation is further evidenced by the selection of occasions for the presentation of his organ concertos. Even in these days of advertising and self-aggrandisement, the figure of a man who, in addition to assuming the direction of one of his works, claims the attention of his audience between parts to a display of his skill as performer of another of his own compositions, would be regarded as "a rather steep" exhibition of personality, to quote a familiar Americanism. But, not to be too severe upon Handel's methods of making himself felt, it must be remembered that he was practising in a then somewhat unsympathetic art atmosphere, that he had enemies to conquer, and even his friends had to be pleased, and he would probably entertain, to some extent, the foreigner's traditional belief, that "England was a happy hunting ground," in which securing a good bag was a matter ranking nearly level in importance with the cultivation of art—a view of life shared by a good many Englishmen, though very different to that entertained by the stay-at-home Bach. And truly we are all thankful that Handel did labour so diligently and did make such use of his opportunities as to leave us such treasures of bright, yet solid, music as the concertos for the organ, in several sets; and it is not to be forgotten that he wrote largely and effectively for the orchestra in various other suite and concerto forms. Handel's organ concertos were, in short, intended not only to be such good music as would be worthy of their illustrious composer, but to be essentially popular music, and as such they will ever remain fresh and attractive. The brightness and vigour, beauty and science to be found in Handel's organ concertos are to be wondered at when we remember the limited orchestra employed, and, above all, the poverty-stricken organs upon which they were originally played. These instruments—such as were found in the theatres sometimes erected temporarily for the oratorio seasons, concert rooms, and public gardens of the day—consisted of two manuals, perhaps sometimes only one manual, a limited great organ, and probably a small fiddle G swell, with toe-pedals merely coupling to the keys. Handel only once writes a separate part for the pedals, a ground bass in the first concerto third set; a part covering the compass of an octave and a fourth, from F to the upper B flat. It should, however, be borne in mind that these concertos were published as for harpsichord and organ, consequently the string keyboard instrument might be kept in view in their construction; and it seems evident that the organ part was regarded as a somewhat free performance, with much left to the judgment of the player.

As regards the opportunities provided for their public performance, there was a wide difference between the select, thoughtful lovers of the organ Bach played before from time to time, assembled in large, lofty churches, and the miscellaneous crowd of concert-goers, enjoying free liberty to applaud or condemn, and doubtless often very indifferent regarding the instrument they had to listen to so long as the music pleased them, forming Handel's audiences. And it may be well to remember that Bach wrote for comparatively large and generally fairly complete organs; whilst Handel had small, incomplete, and it may be often indifferent instruments to deal with, the tones of which had to be strengthened, and the limited effects of which had to be ingeniously eked out by the use of the orchestra. Of course, the best rendering of Handel's concertos is, and always will be, that which employs the orchestra, and a small organ and limited orchestra—the original score depended chiefly upon the strings with oboes and bassoons, parts for other wood wind, trumpets, horns and drums have been added to a few concertos by modern hands, and are still in MS.—will produce excellent effect in these fine and spirited works. They deserve indeed to be heard much more frequently with organ and orchestra. To the general body of organ players, Handel's concertos must be used for recital purposes solo fashion, pure and simple; and in this way they are capable of being the medium of great and varied organic effects, and of still delighting listeners, whether learned or unlearned in the musical art.

STORY OF THE OLD ORGAN IN THE CATHEDRAL "BEATÆ MARIÆ VIRGINIS," IN WOLFENBUTTEL.

II.

Written from information in existing documents by Selmar Muller, and translated by F. E. T.

Although the memoranda written inside the organ are very brief, they tell us what we principally wish to know, the names of the builders who repaired and enlarged the instrument.

The condition of the organ, which made renovation necessary after a period of only eighteen years, was, probably, in consequence of the dust caused by the completion of the interior of the church. The builder of the organ, according to the notice written inside it, was Gottfried Fritzen, of Dresden. The name is evidently mis-spelt, and should be "Fritsche." There was, at this period, a celebrated organ-builder, named Gottfried Fritsche, living in Dresden, who supplied organs in 1614 for the Castle Church, Dresden, in 1616 for Trinity Church, Sondershausen, and in 1629 for the Maria Magdalena Church, Hamburg. The authorities, wishing to put only the best of work in the new church, would naturally apply to the most celebrated organ-builder of his day. We should have been left in ignorance on two very important points in every organ — the specification and cost—had it not been for the accidental discovery, inside a document treating of the sculpture, gilding and painting in the church, of two papers giving a full explanation of matters connected with the organ. One of these documents is an undated specification drawn up in the form of a contract with the organ-builder, Fritsche, to be completed in 1620. This specification belongs to the same period, or about a year earlier, for as we already know, a large organ was under consideration in 1619. The signature is that of Michael Praetorius, court organist at Wolfenbüttel, one of the most learned and celebrated musicians and composers of his time, who died on February 15th, 1621. In such an important matter as the construction of an organ worthy of the new large church, those in authority did well to take the distinguished church composer and organist into their councils.

ORGAN-BLOWING BY ELECTRICITY.

A new departure has been made at St. John's Church, Taunton, where the first successful attempt has been made to solve the problem of organ-blowing by electricity. The organ has 36 stops, and the blowing is so quietly effected—without the vibration which even the steadiest manual blowing imparts, and without the tension on the bellows which blowing by gas engine involves—that the pleasure of playing upon so excellent an instrument is greatly enhanced. The organist has at any time simply to take his seat at the manuals, and turning on a switch—as he would turn on a water tap—can commence playing at once. This switch brings the whole arrangement under his complete control; it is affixed to the front of the organ just above the stops on the right hand of the manuals, and communicates through a series of carbons—which bring the current to a very low intensity, and render the appliances perfectly safe to handle—with the motor in the tower, some 45ft. above. This motor is of nominally half-horse power, but will develop about double that power; it weighs 42lb., and occupies about ten square inches of space; the armatures change the polarity of the electro-magnets surrounding them, and thus cause the revolutions of a wheel about 3in. in diameter—about 1,600 revolutions per minute being attainable. The motor was supplied and the electric connections made by the Electric Lighting Company, under the superintendence of the electrician-in-charge, Mr. Hooker, and it is worked by 30 large-sized accumulators at the central depôt, rather more than a quarter of a mile distant. The motor and machinery attached thereto are suspended on beams built into the tower, so as to avoid the possibility of any vibration. The small wheel of the motor is attached by a half-inch rope to a fly-wheel 4ft. in diameter, an ingenious arrangement by a weighted pulley compensating for changes in the temperature. This portion of the work has been carried out by Messrs. Allen, engineers, Taunton, and the remainder by Mr. Minns, organ builder, Taunton, who has taken special care to isolate by felt and other materials all the work. The fly-wheel operates a double feeder, four feet by two feet, which when working at full speed will make 90 strokes and deliver about a million cubic inches of air per minute; close by is a reservoir with powerful concussion bellows, and this communicates by means of a trunk 40 feet long and 22 inches by 5 inches with the large wind chest of the organ; this trunk is carefully insulated, and ends in a small chamber with a roller valve, acting automatically, which prevents too great a pressure of wind being forced into the wind chest. As soon as the wind chest is full, the current is broken by an automatic switch and the motor stops, but when the reservoir has lost about an inch of its distension the switch again completes the current and a few revolutions of the motor restore the equilibrium—a piece of asbestos preserves the woodwork from injury by the flash arising from the breaking of the current. The organist is provided with two switches, one of which is of low intensity and allows a sufficient current for ordinary service playing, while the second supplies the additional power necessary in case of a prolonged loud voluntary. The new application is in every way a most gratifying success.

REVIEWS.

An Explanation of the Organ Stops. Carl Locher, translated by Agnes Schanenberg (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co., 1, Paternoster-row.) Though set out in dictionary form, this is the most comprehensive and complete book of its kind. The author, who is organist at Berne, tells us in his preface that his work originally formed a course of lectures to organists, and was printed by request of a committee of teachers. During a practice of 25 years he has carefully studied his subject. He had sympathetic help from eminent friends, and the work is dedicated to Professor Helmholtz. The information about the various stops is remarkably complete both as regards acoustical and tone-colour distinctions. Numerous illustrations adorn the work, and aid the lucid explanations of the author. Originally based upon Continental significations, perhaps a little more might be said here and there by way of making these more applicable to English equivalent terms, and a wider justice might have been dealt out to our many distinguished organ-builders in cases in which names and specimen organs are mentioned. The many and varied subjects are, however, admirably treated, and the book well deserves a wide and extensive circulation. It is admirably got up, and most clearly printed.

The Organist's Quarterly Journal, edited by Dr. W. Spark (Novello and Co.). Part 78, for April, contains a "Descriptive Fantasia, In Memoriam" Sir G. A. Macfarren, by the editor; an excellent, though now and again slightly dry "Fantasia" in A, by Otto Thomas, of Dresden, a work organists will enjoy, however; and an "Andante con Moto" in G, by Mr. Blakeley, a simple, taking piece in Rondo form, with the various presentations varied in telling fashion, and in such manner as to well display sundry ear-tickling stops.

Fantasia per Organo, F. Capocci (Weekes and Co., Hanover Square, W.). An important and highly effective work of considerable length, composed for the inauguration of the two new organs at St. John Lateran, Rome. The Fantasia opens with a stately movement, including an episode of interest in the minor mode. A beautiful and expressive Andante in A flat well displays the softer combinations. A return to the original tonic major C, with two well-defined subjects and much interesting detail shaped into a striking movement, closing with the full organ, completes one of the composer's best pieces and a work sure to enjoy an extensive popularity.

ST. PAUL'S.

The fifteenth annual festival of the London Church Choirs Association was held on April 26 in St. Paul's Cathedral, in the presence of a congregation of nearly 10,000 persons. About 800 choristers took part in the affair, including volunteers not only from the various London churches, but also from Friern Barnet, Leyton, Deptford, Highgate, and elsewhere in the outskirts, and a contingent from the Church Choir established at the Royal Small Arms Factory, Enfield. Since last year a notable and much-needed improvement is observable. Trumpets and trombones were used. Mr. Eaton Faning's Evening Service in C, and Dr. Stainer's anthem, "Lord, Thou art God," were the chief musical features of the service. It should be added that the prayers were intoned by the Rev. W. Russell, Succentor of St. Paul's; that the lessons were read by the Rev. E. Collett, of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate, and by the Rev. W. D. Fanshawe, chaplain to the Bishop of London; and that the sermon was preached by the Bishop of Marlborough. Dr. Stainer's gifted pupil Mr. Hodge played the organ, and Dr. G. C. Martin conducted.

TUBULAR PNEUMATIC ACTION.

To the Editor of THE ORGAN WORLD.

SIR,—There is, I believe, a common feeling among those organists who have the pleasure of presiding over such instruments as require the above action, that the advantage of a light touch is almost practically annulled by the unclean effect produced by the same means which, with a tracker action, would be considered perfectly clean; the difficulty arises from the fact that so soon as the key is depressed even to a tenth or a twelfth of an inch in some cases, the motor is at work and the pallet fully opens the pipes, then speaking immediately with their full supply of wind, and continue to do so till the key has fully recovered itself, and is in its original position, so that in playing a series of chordy passages, as in Hesse's Toccata in A flat, where the fingers are nearly all employed at once, or very florid passages, as Bach's Toccata in C, it is extremely difficult to play them without an amount of blurring even by a good player, which ought not to exist. The difficulty has, I consider, been overcome by the new system quite recently invented by Mr. E. H. Luggate, at his factory, Marylebone Road, which, without giving details, which are extremely ingenious, I may strictly state, causes the pipes to speak as usual (a little less readily, perhaps, than under the old system; they can, however, be regulated by the builder), but they cease to do so after the key has returned to more than ¾ or ⅝ of its total depression, by which means it will be seen that a remarkably brilliant effect may be produced with care, and at the same time legato effects, so dear to organists, will not be impaired, so that when the system is completely carried out it should prove a great boon to those organists who are frequently called upon to give recitals and play music of a very florid nature on large organs.

Although this system is in its infancy as regards its practical application, its efficacy can be established by the result on the one experiment at Bishop and Sons' factory, above-mentioned. This has also been applied for the first time to the pedal organ at St. Peter's, Battersea, with remarkable effects. True it is that the acoustical properties of the church are extremely good; but the quick pedal passages and shakes, so perfectly clear and distinct on the organ, prove, in my humble opinion, that a new era in "action" has been opened to us, and that the difficulties of the old (and I may still venture to call it so) pneumatic are dispensed with, and the problem of how to get the tubular pneumatic to cease "speaking even by a glance," as I heard a well-known doctor once say, has been solved, and should this gain general approval (and it bids fair to do so) it will prove to be a boon to organists of all classes, whose thanks will be due to the inventor, Mr. E. H. Luggate.—I am, dear sir, faithfully yours,

C. EDGAR PETTMAN, A.C.O.,
Organist and Director of the Choirs St. Mary's,
Kilburn, and St. Andrew's, Kensington.

SPECIFICATION.

GLASGOW.

On April 26th, Mons. August Wiegand inaugurated the new organ in the Macleod Parish Church.

The following is the specification prepared by the late Nathaniel J. Holmes, Esq. The instrument was constructed by M. Chas. Anneesslus, Grammont.

GREAT ORGAN—Compass CC to C in alt.; 61 notes (5 octaves).

Notes.

Mr. Bruce H. Steane, A.C.O., has been appointed organist to St. Bartholomew's Convalescent Home, Swanley.

In an article on "Niagara Falls," an evening paper observes, anent the mighty roar of its waters:—"One can never forget the effect of listening to this mighty voice for the first time, nor is it an unpleasant sound which assails the ear. The roar is positively musical, they say, and a few years ago a distinguished American organist spent a long time in studying it, and trying to learn the measure and compass of its tones. He finally came to the conclusion that the deepest tone made by the falling cataract was that which would be produced by an organ pipe about 160ft. in length, and of proportionate dimensions as organ pipes are made. Now, 160ft., which is about the height of the falls (this varies from 160ft. to nearly 180ft.), is much longer than any organ pipe is made, and the sound emitted by such a pipe would not be sensible to us as a musical sound. Therefore our ears could not apprehend the music of the deepest tones; and as our ears are at fault, we give this deep-toned music such discordant epithets as noise and roar.' This story, according to one account, seems incorrectly stated. The organist in question suggested a sound not nearly three octaves below 32ft. C, but about F sharp below that note. The present writer tried to define the vast harmonic hum of the great waterfalls, and came to the conclusion that the task was all but hopeless, although a steady kind of tone seems to be maintained; and certainly the imagination might readily seize upon such a note as the authority in question named, but whether the indefinite sound could be described as of a foundation or upper partial tone character, it would be impossible to say. It seems only fair to mention the fact that the difficulties named by my esteemed correspondent have been conquered by recent inventions of other well-known organ-builders. I am unable, however, to say by what means, or how far these inventions differ from the clever contrivances of Mr Luggate.

Dr. Stainer has, with characteristic modesty, quietly retired from the organistship of St. Paul's Cathedral, but he was not allowed to leave without sundry testimonials from those connected with the cathedral, expressing the high esteem in which he was held by all. Dr. Stainer attended the levée on April 30th. His closing service at St. Paul's was morning prayer on May 4th, according to arrangement He will have every good wish in his retirement, and every good wish will also attend his esteemed successor, Dr. Martin, and his assistant organist, Mr. W. Hodge.

Printers now and again make strange mistakes. Some amusing misprints of dates occur in a recent recital programme. Smart's birth and death dates are given as 1776-1867, instead of 1813-1876; Bach's birth 1615 instead of 1685; but the most curious erratum concerns Haydn, who, according to the printer, began life in 1732 and terminated his career in 1109.

There is said to be an old organ in the Garrison Chapel, Salzburgh, which may, from the description given, be a specimen of the positive or ancient chancel organ.

The distinguished American organist, Mr. H. Clarence Eddy, announces that in future he will be known only as Clarence Eddy, "the initial 'H' having been discarded in accordance with the laws of the State of Illinois."

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS' CALENDAR.

On Tuesday, the library will be opened from 7 to 10. May 22nd, at 8, at the Bloomsbury Hall, Hart Street, Mr. E. H. Turpin will offer some remarks on "Elementary Orchestration." Members, students, and friends are invited to bring with them copies of Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonatas, passages from which will be quoted as furnishing suggestions for typical and varied instrumentation. June 26th, Lecture by Dr. C. W. Pearce; July 17th, 18th, 19th, F.C.O. Examination; July 20th, Diploma Distribution; July 24th, 25th, 26th, A.C.O. Examination; July 27th, Diploma Distribution. Other arrangements and particulars will be duly announced.

ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS.

You are kindly requested to write for Ainsworth's "New Patent Organ Pedal Combination List." Ainsworth's "New Patent" is perfectly unique and may be combined easily with any Piano. It is the only one which may be safely combined with any Piano without deteriorating the instrument. Having put down at my works two engines and machinery of the most desirable kind, I am now supplying my goods at a price which enables every organist and organ student to have always ready for use in his Studio an

ORGAN PEDAL PIANO,

Affording Perfectly Unique Pedal Practice.

34, Sheen Park, Richmond.

Dear Sir,—I have deferred writing to comment upon your Pedals and Action now attached to my pianoforte until I could satisfy myself of their utility and efficiency. I can now conscientiously say that they more than fulfil all my anticipations. Although I am no carpenter, aided by your lucid diagram I had little difficulty in attaching them myself, and it is impossible to over-estimate the comfort they give to me or to conceive the saving of time one experiences in one's own room.—Believe me, yours truly,

BURNHAM HORNER, F.R. Hist.S.

To Mr. Mr. Ainsworth.

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to bear testimony to the perfection of your Invention. I am more than satisfied with your Patent Action and Organ Pedals, and consider them worth double the money. Organists and organ students who desire to improve in the Art of Pedalling, which is so essential to a good organist, will do well to procure a set. I have seen no Action half so effective, and one can sit at the Piano and play, "Fixed in his everlasting seat," or any other organ music, or organ arrangement with the greatest pleasure. The touch of pedals could not be better, and the action is as you say, "Absolutely free from annoyances." They cannot be too highly recommended, as by their use, rapid progress is certain.—Believe me, sincerely yours,

I. B. Thornton,
Organist, Birstall, Leeds.

Cologne, July 16th, 1886.

My Dear Sir,—I have much pleasure in informing you that your Pedals have given the fullest satisfaction. I have them combined with my practice Piano. Many of my musical friends who have seen them, as well as my organ pupils, are quite delighted with them; and I must acknowledge that I have never met with any Pedals so noiseless and pleasant to play upon as yours. The Action I consider durable, and of very good workmanship. Every organist who desires to perfect his playing will welcome your invention. I can recommend your goods in every respect.—Yours truly,

Herr J. RODENKIRCHEN.

To John Ainsworth, Esq. Organist, The Cathedral, Cologne, Germany.

TOOLS.—In order to facilite the attachment, a complete set of tools are sent (four in number) each one marked for its particular use. By the use of these tools, and following carefully the directions, ANY ONE can make a really good attachment.

"Musical World" Portraits.

MR. ZAVERTAL.

Ladislas Zavertal was born at Milan on September 29th, 1849. His mother was an Italian lady and distinguished musician; his father of Austrian nationality.

Zavertal's mother began early to cultivate the musical talent of her son, who, in his 15th year, published his first artistic attempt at Milan, and in his 19th year produced an opera, "Tita," composed with the assistance of his father. Although this opera had a marked success, it could not hold its place in the répertoires on account of the libretto, which was weak, and written in dialect. We hear that the composer has procured a new libretto, and hopes to place his work of former years before the public revised by his later experiences and studies.

When 20 years of age, Zavertal was conductor of the orchestra of a theatre at Milan. In this position he gained the goodwill of the general public as well as of the critics, among whom must be specially mentioned the late Signor Filippi, who many times in his writings spoke most highly, not only of Zavertal's abilities as conductor, but also of his compositions.

Two years later, Zavertal left Milan and went to Glasgow, where the conductorship of two musical societies had been offered him. Here he remained during 10 years.

While in Glasgow, the first performance of his opera, "A night in Florence" took place at Prague, and gained the favour of the critics and public through its interesting action and charming music. Fired by the success of this work and the approval of the public, he wrote a second opera for the National Theatre at Prague, called "Mirra."

At the special request of Dr. Hans von Bülow, Zavertal conducted the orchestra on several occasions when that artist played at Glasgow, Dundee, and Edinburgh, and gave great satisfaction to the great "Master Conductor."

In 1881 the post of conductor of the Royal Artillery band became vacant. Among 80 candidates Zavertal, on the strength of a musical examination, obtained the post. Under his care, the string and military band has attained a high state of perfection, well known among London audiences; and the concerts given during the winter months in the Garrison Theatre, Woolwich, are invariably crowded by large and fashionable audiences from London. Princess Frederica of Hanover, twice honoured them with her presence, as did also Count Münster and other distinguished people.

Among Zavertal's other compositions there are operettas in one act; a quartet for piano, violin, viola and 'cello; an album of pianoforte pieces, which was graciously accepted by Queen Margherita of Italy.

The King of Italy has bestowed on him, the "Order of the Crown of Italy." He was further honoured by receiving the "Order of the Redeemer" from the King of Greece. The ancient Society of St. Cecilia of Rome has also elected him one of its members—a distinction not easily obtained.

Zavertal has written two symphonies; the first in C minor (dedicated to his father) was highly spoken of by the Dresden Press; and Dr. Richter, to whom it was played, promised to introduce it at Vienna.

The second, in D minor, was performed at Woolwich on April 4th, and quite recently at Princes' Hall, being on both occasions well received by the public and favourably noticed by the Press.

PRESS NOTICES.

There can be no doubt that if musical artists—especially those among them who are ever so ready to criticise the critics—were now and then allowed to contribute notices of their own performances, one result of this expedient would be to add considerable liveliness to the pages of a professional journal. We were induced to try this experiment for once last week, when we gave insertion to a curiously naive communication, received from a lady signing herself "M. Carlisle"—the more readily since her letter was headed with the peremptory words, "this is for publication." That a singer against whose artistic abilities we know nothing, and have said nothing, should feel indignant because in the account of a local concert devoted almost exclusively to instrumental chamber music, the introduction of a few songs was dismissed in equally few words, will be regarded by most people as a matter of comparatively small importance. It is only when we are confronted with notions entertained in at least one quarter, as to the duties and functions of musical critics at concerts, that the incident, not unprecedented in itself, arouses sundry reflections of a more or less perturbing, one might almost say harrowing, nature. The conscientious editorial mind, indeed, literally recoils at the thought here suggested, of past obligations unfulfilled, of flagrant injustice to individuals so often unwittingly committed, and, what is perhaps worse than all, of the crushing burden of future work which a suddenly awakened sense of duty now imposes upon it.

For what is the real meaning of the new departure to which we are required by implication to consider ourselves committed? In the first place we shall have to more than double or treble the bulk of our journal, in order to give exhaustive accounts, not only of every provincial concert in the United Kingdom, but also of what occurred at supper afterwards, merely that future historians, when tracing the progress of musical art in the nineteenth century, may be enabled to duly dwell upon details such as those which, owing to the culpable negligence of our representative on the particular occasion under consideration, were for the first time revealed to us in all their momentous significance by our correspondent herself. This aggrieved artist, after letting the world into a delicate secret connected with her engagement, by informing us that she had consented to give her services "merely for expenses," and by whose request she did so, goes on to describe the enthusiastic recall and encore elicited by "one of my songs," her adjournment to the rectory for the night, and finally the evening meal, sweetened by the compliments of the rector upon her success with an Essex audience, whom few vocalists are capable of stirring. Mr. Armfield, sen., we are further informed, in addition to his musical acquirements is well behind the scenes in literary affairs, and thus fully conversant with the meannesses and subterfuges of local reporters. "He dilated largely on the utter worthlessness of press notices, as all that the press wanted was 'copy.'" And here we come to a more serious matter. Already we begin to sniff mischief in the air, and vague suspicions oppress the mind of some dark, unhallowed conspiracy to nip in the bud a growing reputation, and to hide from the knowledge of the world a genius of which it might otherwise have an opportunity of being proud. Emboldened, no doubt, by the assurances of Mr. Armfield, senior, who knows all about the press, the writer does not hesitate to launch an accusation at our heads. "I observe in your paper that you have evidently been supplied with 'copy' from a source which is unfaithful and unfriendly to myself."

Passing by the fact that absence of criticism, favourable or unfavourable, such as forms the basis of the present complaint, seems to be a rather strange way of appeasing that hunger for "copy" attributed to the press generally, and presumably to ourselves in particular, we will venture to say that a day's experience in the editorial departments of this and many another paper, would cause the writer to materially modify her views, not only on this point, but on many others. Among other things she would discover that while the very good or the very bad in art are comparatively easy to deal with, the vast amount of mediocrity always with us, clamouring noisily for notice, constitutes an ever standing difficulty for critics, reporters, editors, and all connected with the production of a professional journal. Some idea of the extent of this difficulty may be formed from the example now afforded of a direct charge of personal malice brought by a dissatisfied artist, whose high reputation we had not sufficiently taken into account. To detect and draw attention to hitherto unrecognised merit no doubt ranks among the pleasantest and proudest privileges of a musical critic, and if, in the present case, our representative has lost an opportunity, retribution is almost sure to dog his footsteps in the future, when the name he has so cursorily mentioned shall have been made famous by other means throughout the length and breadth of the land. As far as this journal, however, is concerned, we may confidently assert that its representatives fulfil the sometimes difficult duties entrusted to them without fear or favour, and certainly without personal hostility. It cannot be too strongly urged upon the attention of those concerned that the duties in question consist, to a great extent, in selecting from an overwhelming mass of weekly material, such part of it as is likely to prove of general interest; and that the critic, when fulfilling his functions, is bound to consider the public, and not individuals. Meanwhile, judging from the specimen now before us, we have decided to return to the good old plan of writing our own notices, instead of expecting from artists that rarest of all virtues, self-knowledge and self-criticism.

Concerts.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The fourth concert of the Philharmonic Society redeemed another important promise by bringing forward, in the various capacities of composer, pianist, conductor, and accompanist, Edvard Grieg, "the Chopin of the North," yet even more national than Chopin himself, the northern element being impressed on every bar of his music. In the performance of his magnificent and enormously difficult Pianoforte Concerto in A minor (first introduced with considerable éclat by Mr. Dannreuther), Edvard Grieg proved himself a pianist of the first rank, whose performance is alike distinguished by exquisite delicacy and grace and irresistible élan, combined with remarkable crispness of touch, producing altogether that electric effect which is the gift of the chosen few. That the composer equally excelled in the accompaniment of three of his imaginative songs delivered by Miss Carlotta Elliot goes without saying; and he likewise shone as conductor of his two lovely "Elegiac Melodies," brought out with striking success at the London Symphony Concerts, and executed with splendid effect by the stringed orchestra, the second number being encored on the present occasion. Indeed, the reception awarded to Edvard Grieg was marked throughout by quite extraordinary enthusiasm—the just deserts of one of the most gifted and "individual" composers of the day. With reference to the Pianoforte Concerto, the instincts of little less than actual genius alone can produce such a score at a first attempt at orchestral writing—a worthy parallel in this respect to Robert Schumann's first Symphony in B flat.

Another genuine treat was afforded by the first performance in England of Georges Bizet's "Petite Suite: Jeux d'Enfans," written originally for the pianoforte alone, and scored by the composer in 1873 for the Paris "Colonne" concerts. That these orchestral "bagatelles," replete with melody, grace, piquancy, and charm, like all the music from the same pen, will, after the great success achieved, be heard again is certain, the wonder being that they have not been heard before. Altogether, this concert, which also included an excellent rendering of Mozart's delightful Symphony in C, No. 6, and Mendelssohn's brilliant "Ruy Blas" overture, under Mr. Frederic H. Cowen's direction, and an air from Massenet's "Hérodiade," adequately interpreted by the above-mentioned vocalist, justly deserves a red letter mark in the annals of this ancient Society.

THE QUEEN AT THE ALBERT HALL.

By command of the Queen, a performance of Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Golden Legend" conducted by the composer, took place at the Albert Hall on Tuesday afternoon. The same distinction, it will be remembered, was conferred last year upon Gounod's "Mors et Vita"—a work as essentially French in character as the "Golden Legend" is representative of our modern English school. It may indeed be said that no work of that school could have been more fitly honoured by the Royal presence. For, the question of abstract merit being left apart, there is no doubt that among contemporary composers there is none so essentially national, so thoroughly imbued with the grace and melodious charm of the earlier English masters as Sir Arthur Sullivan; and it is equally certain that those qualities are nowhere shown to a greater advantage than in the "Golden Legend"—its composer's masterpiece in the cantata form. The Queen arrived at 4 o'clock and was warmly cheered on entering the hall, band and chorus simultaneously performing the National Anthem. Her Majesty graciously bowed in acknowledgment of the applause of the audience, and seemed deeply moved by the cordial reception given to her. The sight was indeed a very impressive one. Whatever may be said against the acoustical qualities of the Albert Hall, it cannot be denied that its imposing dimensions and its fine architecture are eminently adapted to an occasion of this kind. Only a great nation could supply such a hall and fill it with such an audience. This thought gave its special significance to the scene. Of the musical performance it will be possible to speak in brief terms, for the reason, among others, that in all essential points it was not open to adverse criticism. The Albert Hall chorus is quite familiar with this not very difficult music, and such pieces as the beautiful opening, where bells and human voices go in unison, and the pilgrims' chorus in Scene 3, were given with sonorous power. But even more laudable, because infinitely more rare, were the pianos and decrescendos, which the singers, obeying the conductor's slightest hint, achieved with a delicacy seldom or never witnessed outside the Albert Hall. Of the soloists, Madame Albani, who was in splendid voice, Madame Patey, and Mr. Henschel—a humorous and full-voiced Lucifer—were familiar to the parts they represented. It would be ungracious to Mr. Banks, the new tenor, to compare him with his great prototype in the character of Prince Henry—Mr. Lloyd, who is absent in America, much to the detriment of the musical season. Mr. Banks has an agreeable voice, and sings with intelligence; at the same time he was scarcely equal to his task in the fine melodious phrase, "It is the sea," and still less in the final duet with Madame Albani, in which that artist, according to her wont, used every advantage which the strength and tonal beauty of her organ give her over weaker brethren.

SENOR SARASATE'S CONCERT.

The first of four concerts announced by Senor Sarasate took place on Saturday afternoon, and was attended by a very large audience, the Spanish violinist being among the very few virtuosi capable of filling St. James's Hall, or, to put the matter in a purely practical way, of making money in London, which to most foreign artists serves only as a starting-point for provincial success. That this popularity is undeserved even the staunchest admirer of Joachim and the classical style represented by him would scarcely venture to assert, for, although the manner in which Sarasate plays German music, and, for example, played Beethoven's Concerto on Saturday, is the reverse of German, there is not in it anything essentially uncongenial to the spirit of these great works. Only that spirit is reflected in a Southern mind, from which it receives additional sparkle and brilliancy and fire without losing any of its sterling qualities. The best proof of this is the immense popularity which Senor Sarasate enjoys in Germany, where, if anywhere, classical tradition should be a living thing. Again on Saturday the artist's reading of Beethoven's masterpiece, so familiar to every amateur, was duly appreciated by the audience, the beauty of tone with which the slow movement was "sung"—for that is the only adequate expression—standing forth as a perfect thing, while, on the other hand, Senor Sarasate took the final allegro at a break-neck speed, as is his wont. In this we think he is mistaken; not that he fails to play every note with marvellous accuracy, but the rhythmical emphasis of the phrases can scarcely be realised when those phrases are hurried past the mind in this manner. Not forgetting the modern over the classical, the artist added to Beethoven's Concerto Raff's Suite for violin and orchestra, in which again the slow movement entitled "Aria" was a triumph of tone and phrasing, while the finale was given with a lightness and grace of perpetual motion which gave its true meaning to the indication moto perpetuo applied to this movement by the composer. With a commonplace, though fairly effective, ballade by Moszkowski we would willingly have dispensed, but in his last contribution, Saint-Saëns's "Rondo capriccioso," the artist showed himself in yet another light, rendering the subtle and piquant effects of the piece as one to the French manner born. Under Mr. Cusins's able conductorship the orchestral accompaniments, as well as Mendelssohn's Italian symphony and Weber's "Oberon" overture, were admirably played.

MDLLE. JULIETTE FOLVILLE'S MATINEE.

A very remarkable performance was given by Mdlle. Julielle Folville, pianist, violinist, composer (from Belgium), at Princes' Hall. The séance opened with a pianoforte recital, comprising a varied selection of nine pieces, classical and modern, played without a break, with finished technique, striking fulness of tone, and admirable refinement of expression. Something like a sensation was created when this young lady—only just 17—displayed the same qualities of high excellence in some half-a-dozen soli for the violin (played, like the pianoforte pieces, from memory), including a most attractive rendering of Mendelssohn's Concerto, and concluding with a veritable bravura piece, by O. Musin, executed with faultless precision. Indeed it would be difficult to decide in which of the above-named capacities the youthful musician shone most, not the least graceful feature being her own skilfully and elegantly written compositions for pianoforte and violin respectively. That Mdlle. Folville is an artist jusqu'au bout des ongles, is beyond doubt. We hope to hear more of her during the present season. Special recognition is due to Herr Wilhelm Ganz's masterly execution of the difficult pianoforte part in Mendelssohn's concerto and of the rest of the accompaniment s

THE RICHTER CONCERTS.

The first Richter concert of the season, given at St. James's Hall on Monday, besides being successful in itself, augured well for the continued success of these excellent performances, which have become one of the most important features of musical life in London. It is scarcely necessary to state that the hall was crowded and that the great conductor was welcomed by a perfect storm of applause. These things are almost a foregone conclusion at the Richter concerts. Neither is it necessary to dwell upon the excellence of the orchestra, which, under Herr Richter's leadership, rendered Beethoven's C minor symphony and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 4 in a manner not likely to be forgotten. What is more specially worthy of mention is the fact that the interest of novelty had been imparted to the programme from a source which, to the casual observer, might seem exhausted. The difficulty of finding appropriate new works in an age when so little music above the level of clever mediocrity is written is even greater at the Richter concerts than elsewhere. For, as the programmes of these concerts are in the main devoted to Beethoven and Wagner, other music included in them must of necessity run the risk of appearing smaller than it is by the side of these giants. Herr Richter, therefore, with all his desire of fostering rising talent, and more especially English talent, is naturally very careful in the selection of his novelties. In the present instance he has fallen back upon one of Wagner's music-dramas which has so far yielded comparatively little for concert use, the "Götterdämmerung." The scene selected is known as "Hagen's Wacht," which, in a musical sense, is a monologue, or what the earlier writers would have called a scena, and for that reason is well adapted for separate performance. Apart from this, it is singularly vocal and full of beautiful melody, although assigned to the villain of the piece. Declaimed by Mr. Henschel with that true emphasis and rare intelligence of diction so indispensable in Wagner's music, the fragment made a profound impression on the audience, and will, no doubt, be heard again. Mr. Henschel also sang the lovely and by this time familiar "Das schōne Fest," from "Die Meistersinger," and the orchestra played, in addition to the pieces already named, Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," and Wagner's "Kaisermarsch," the latter of which received a certain pathetic interest from the fact of this being the first performance at these concerts since the death of the Emperor, in whose honour it was written.

MME. DE LLANA'S RECITAL.

On Wednesday afternoon an appreciative, if somewhat small, audience assembled in the Princes' Hall for Mme. de Llana's pianoforte recital. This talented pianist was assisted by Mr. Ben Davies, the well-known tenor from the "Dorothy," company, and M. Bernhardt, a violinist of some power. The programme was made up of selections from Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Grieg, Dvorak, Chopin, and Liszt. Grieg's interesting sonato in C minor, for pianoforte and violin, op. 45, was well rendered by Madame de Llana and M. Bernhardt, though the pianoforte part somewhat overpowered the violin, which was thin in tone. Mme. de Llana phrases intelligently and correctly. Mr. Ben Davies's songs were given in excellent style.

AGNES MEYER'S ANNUAL CONCERT.

Frl. Agnes Meyer gave her Second Annual Concert at the Steinway Hall, on Tuesday last, when she was assisted by Miss Clara Cornwall, Mr. W. Shakespeare, and Mr. John Cornwall, vocalists, and Mdlle. Marie Ernst, Frl. Anna Biesner, and Messrs. Schuberth and Woledge, instrumentalists. An attractive and, on the whole, a well rendered programme was pleasantly varied by a couple of recitations by Miss Olga Schuberth.

PROVINCIAL.

BIRMINGHAM, April 30.—The Edgbaston Orchestral Amateur Musical Union and the Moseley Choral Society combined their forces and gave a grand concert in aid of the Deaf and Dumb Institution. It was an ambitious attempt on the part of these bodies to attack no less a work than Rossini's "Stabat Mater." However, they came off with flowing colours, and the performance on the whole may favourably compare with those given by professional societies. A young débutante, Miss N. F. Gosnell, a pupil of Mr. J. Pearce, one of our foremost teachers of singing, undertook the soprano part, and created a most favourable impression by her clear and fresh voice. The concerted parts were given by Miss Gosnell and Miss Emilie Harris (the latter a mezzo soprano of no mean order) with excellent effect. Mr. E. Kemp, the tenor from Lichfield Cathedral, sung the "Cujus Animam" with spirit, displaying a light but charming voice. Mr. G. Brewerton (bass), a local amateur, was ill-advised in undertaking the bass part, as his voice lacked the necessary compass. Mr. Brewerton otherwise sings with much art and refinement. The accompaniments were given effectively, and the band is making rapid progress under their conductor, Mr. F. W. Cooke. Miss Fanny Davies gave a Pianoforte Recital at the Masonic Hall on Thursday, choosing the following works by the great masters: Prelude and Fugue in E minor, op. 35 No. 1 (Mendelssohn); Sonata in D major, op. 10 No. 3, (Beethoven); Carnaval (by desire) Schumann; Chaconne (Handel); Rhapsodie in G minor (Brahms); Romance in E flat minor, op. 11 (Clara Schumann); Gnomenreigen (Liszt); Valse in E flat, No. 2 (Chopin). To single out any special number would hardly be fair. Miss Davies interpreted every item with faultless technique and finish. All her effects of light and shade are obtained by legitimate means, and to the very last note of her recital the same masterly correctness and purity was discernible. Miss Davies was most enthusiastically received, and after her magnificent playing of Liszt's Gnomenreigen, she gave Rubinstein's Staccato Study for an encore, at almost electrifying speed.—O.P.

NOTTINGHAM.—The annual meeting of the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society was held on April 24th, in the Lecture Hall of the Mechanics' Institute. The chair was taken by Mr. Edwin Mellor, and there was a large attendance amongst those present being—Messrs. W. Allen (treasurer), John Adcock (conductor), F. H. Bedells (secretary), R. Booker, John Wallis, Geo. Pearce, H. W. P. Pine, Arthur Bright, C. L. Rothera, G. Statham, and Wm. Roescher. Mr. Bedells (secretary) read the annual report, which stated that a most attractive series of concerts had been given, but with one exception each resulted in a loss. The performances of the past were: "The Golden Legend" and miscellaneous second part, with Mdme. Albani, Miss D'Alton, Mr. H. Kearton, and Mr. W. Mills; Costa's "Eli," with Mdme. Nordica, Mdme. M'Kenzie, Mr. Piercy, and Mr. Barrington Foote; "The Messiah," with Miss Thudichum, Miss H. Glenn, Mr. Ivor McKay, and Signor Foli; "Creation," parts 1 and 2, and the "Hymn of Praise," with Mdlle. Trebelli, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Brereton, and "Elijah," with Miss Pauline Cramer, Miss Hilda Wilson, Master Draycott, Mr. Hagyard, and Mr. Santley. At the end of last season there were 262 members on the books, this year only 255, being a decrease of seven. Mr. Wm. Allen read the annual financial statement. The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said that as a member of the society he thought they had had a very enjoyable season. The report having been carried, Mr. Allen said the society proposed to commence the coming season with the performance, on October 31st, of Gounod's "Redemption," with Mr. Charles Hallé's band, when Mr. Hallé would conduct. The artists had not been settled. On November 29th there would be performed "The Bride of Dunkerron" and "Loreley," when Madame Nordica, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr, Bridson would sing, and the works had been selected especially to suit Madame Nordica. On December 27th "The Messiah" would be rendered, amongst the artists being Miss Clara Samuel, Miss E. Rees, and Mr. W. Mills. Bennett's "May Queen" would be given on February 14th, together with Beethoven's "Engedi," when Miss Trebelli, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Brereton would sing. "Israel in Egypt" was fixed for March 21st, when the artists would be Miss Thudichum, Miss D'Alton, Mr. Piercey, Mr. V. Edwards, and Mr. T. B. Laxton, The following gentlemen were elected members of the committee, &c.: President, Mr. Henry Farmer: conductor, Mr. John Adcock; treasurer, Mr. W. Allen; committee (for two years), Messrs. F. B. Harris, J. Wallis, W. W. Hopewell, A. Oliver, and H. W. Pine. The annual general meeting of the members of the Nottingham Philharmonic Choir was held on the 25th ult., at the Social Guild, Parliament Street. The Mayor presided, and there was a large attendance. The annual report stated that the past season had been the most interesting and arduous since the extension of the choir's operations in 1885. Commencing the financial year with a debt of nearly £60, and a membership of about 170, the committee had now to report a list of 200 members, and the debt reduced to £25. The ability displayed by the chorus had given Mr. John Farmer such great satisfaction, that the committee were authorised to say that he was composing an oratorio, which he wished to bring out in London next season, and that he would invite the members of the Philharmonic Choir to provide the chorus, the performance to take place in St. James's Hall, and the orchestra to be the celebrated Richter Band. Mr. Edward Lloyd and other eminent vocalists had already been engaged. Arrangements were also maturing for a visit to Oxford on Friday, May 25th next, upon the invitation of the Master of Balliol and the Fellows of the College. The members of the choir and the committee would be entertained at luncheon by the Master of Balliol, and subsequently would witness the boat races. In the evening a concert would be given by the choir in Balliol College. The prospects of the choir were encouraging in every respect, but the committee desired an increase of 50 voices, principally altos and tenors, and they would be pleased to receive nominations at once. The financial statement showed a small balance at the bank. There were outstanding liabilities of about £60 at the commencement of the financial year, but these had been reduced to about £25. The report and balance sheet having been adopted, Mr. W. H. Farmer proposed a hearty vote of thanks to the Mayor for the great services he had rendered to the choir as president in the past, and also named him for re-election in the same position for the ensuing year. Mr. Ward was re-elected conductor.

Manchester, May 8.—At the Free Trade Hall, last night, Otto Hegner made his first appearance in Manchester. The audience though not very large was appreciative, and towards the close of the recital a very high pitch of enthusiasm was reached. The performance was indeed a thoroughly remarkable one, and would have done credit to many who pose as matured pianists. His touch has been developed to a remarkable degree, and though, of course, he is compelled to make a freer use of his arms than is usually permissible, still the effects he gains thereby are legitimate; and his phrasing and manipulation of parts were worthy of all praise. Perhaps his most successful efforts were Bach's Prelude in A flat from the second English Suite, the Rondo Capriccioso of Mendelssohn, Liszt's "Flying Dutchman" transcription, Mendelssohn's Rondo especially being given with a delightful crispness. So far as we could see, the only difficulties which he attempted to avoid were the octave passages, which, of course, are at present beyond his grasp. It was impossible while listening to the little lad not to institute comparisons between him and Hofmann, and, in our opinion, Hegner suffers in no way from the contrast. But the danger to both is the same; and it is a matter for regret that so injurious a forcing process should have been applied to a spirit which is full of high promise for the future.

FOREIGN.

New York, April 7.—Another American composer, Mr. Caryl Florio, has risen up and had the courage to give a public performance of his works. The Thomas orchestra was engaged, and the programme opened with a Symphony, No. 1 in G, which was a successful enough composition on classical lines. In such-like important works, Mr. Florio is at his best, and another Symphony in F, written in the same year (1887) shows a distinct advance upon the first. His pianoforte concerto is, if anything, too heavy, and his smaller vocal pieces want variety and lightness. His "St. Agnes' Eve" was sung by Miss Earle to an organ accompaniment, and with 'cello obbligato. Signor Campanini announces "Otello" for the 9th, at the Academy of Music. Mr. Thomas's Eleventh Symphony Concert included Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, op. 53; Beethoven's Quartet Fugue, op. 133 played by all the strings of the band; and Saint-Saëns's third Symphony in C minor. At Seidl's third Symphony Concert, Symphonies by Beethoven in F and Haydn (Der Bär) were given, also the first movement of Tschaikowsky's Violin Concerto, Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto, and excerpts from Mozart's "Die Entführung." Last Monday saw the production of Verdi's "Otello," at the Academy of Music, under Signor Campanini's direction. It was fairly well put on the stage, and acted in a satisfactory way by the company, Signor Galassi, as Jago, standing out from the rest as being alone fully competent to play the important part he had in hand. This is a worthy end to a splendid musical season, during which no less than 78 great orchestral concerts were given, to say nothing of the brilliant series of German operatic performances, and a host of smaller affairs.

Facts and Comments.

As a report has been going the round of some of the papers that Dr. Hans Von Bülow, wishing to express his satisfaction with the performance at a recent Philharmonic concert in Berlin, established the liberal but somewhat startling precedent of "standing" the orchestra a sum of money all round, it may be as well to state exactly what did occur. The Philharmonic Band in Berlin, like many others, has a pension fund, and to this fund Dr. Bülow presented the sum of £25, the amount of his fee for conducting the last Beethoven Concert. The eminent conductor had already contributed £50 to the Pension and Widows' fund belonging to the orchestra of the Stadt Theatre, Hamburg.

A pianoforte recital will shortly be given by Miss Martha Remmert, who has now returned to England after making a concert tour in Germany. We also hear that this artist has received the honour of an invitation to Marlborough House, to play before the Princess of Wales.

Madame Gerster was in London last week, on her way to Buda Pesth, to fulfil an operatic engagement there.

Besides being a musical prodigy, little Josef Hofmann bids fair to have precocious experience, among other things, of the excitements of litigation. This appears to have arisen out of one of those arrangements which, whatever objections may from time to time be raised against them on artistic grounds, are likely to occur so long as public players and makers of musical instruments remain what they are; and it is stated that Messrs. Weber and Co., the pianoforte manufacturers, are sueing Hofmann's agent, Mr. Abbey, for damages to the tune of 50,000 dollars, for breach of contract in respect of a series of concerts in North America, which were to have been made a medium of advertisement for the firm's pianos.

Mr. Breitner, who has been absent from England for some years, is now again among us, and will shortly be heard in public, in conjunction with his wife, née Julia Haft, of whose talent as a violinist report speaks very favourably.

Mr. Arthur Friedheim, a pianist well-known on the Continent, is now in London, and has made his appearance in due course.

Work is still flowing in upon Mr. Hamish McCunn, who, in addition to the commissions already reported, has now undertaken to supply the Glasgow Choral Union with a new composition for their next season; we believe he has chosen for his subject, "The Lay of the Last Minstrel." Native composers, in fact, when once they have shown themselves capable of producing works above the ordinary level, soon find that there is plenty of room and plenty of welcome for them.

Mr. Johan Svendsen, director of the Opera and Philharmonic, at Copenhagen, has been engaged to conduct the last two Philharmonic Concerts here.

Further accounts have reached us of the enthusiastic reception lately accorded to Madame Patti at Buenos Ayres. On the first night of her appearance in "Il Barbiere" the theatre, constructed for 3,000 persons, was somehow made to hold an extra 500, and anyone going out between the acts was eagerly offered five dollars for his pass. The cost of tickets, indeed, appears to have run up to such a figure, that the only way of enabling any but River Plate millionaires to hear the great prima donna would seem to be the formation of some kind of syndicate.

We are glad to learn that Miss Alice Whitacre has recovered from her recent illness, and will soon return to this side of the Atlantic. Miss Whitacre is visiting her old home in Chicago. She will not sing in America, and after some weeks in Switzerland, will return to resume her work here on September 1st. Her great success on the recent tour with Madame Trebelli, broken by the shock of the sudden death of her father, which caused her illness, has excited great sympathy for the gifted young artist, who has so quickly won her way among us, not alone by her vocal gifts, but by a charm of character and manner which has gained for her many friends in the profession.

After conducting the Philharmonic Concert on Thursday, Mr. Cowen left London yesterday (Friday), to join the Austral at Naples, and there to meet the contingent of musicians which accompanies him to the Antipodes. Our best wishes follow him to the other side of the world. He goes there on an important musical mission, which may spread the taste for high-class music in latitudes and amongst social strata where such a thing has scarcely been known hitherto. His duties will be arduous, as he has to conduct two concerts every day for the space of nearly six months.

The programmes of those concerts will include every class of music, excepting only bad music. Mr. Cowen has taken with him a whole library of scores. English art will, of course, be prominently represented. In addition to this, there will be all the symphonies of Beethoven, all the excerpts of the leading operas in existence, besides no end of Mozart, Haydn, Handel's oratorios, Bach, and many of the modern French composers. If, after that, our Australasian brethren fail to perceive the beauties of the divine art, it will be their own fault. At any rate, they will have had plenty for their money, liberally though they have spent that money.

Mr. Cowen is expected back in England about March next year, and even for that somewhat remote period he has already plenty of work mapped out for him. In addition to the opera which he will write with Mr. Joseph Bennett, he has undertaken to compose a cantata sufficiently long for a whole evening's performance. The libretto of this, founded on a subject from Dante, will be supplied by Mr. Hueffer.

The competition for the Sterndale Bennett Prize, at the Royal Academy of Music, took place yesterday. There were 38 candidates. The prize was awarded to Edith L. Young.

The opportunity now afforded to musical students in remote parts of the country, by the decision of the authorities of Trinity College, London, to teach harmony, counterpoint, &c., by correspondence, is one which, we believe, will exercise a widespread influence on musical education.

The re-opening of Alexandra Palace took place on Saturday last, when there was an attendance of some thousands of visitors. The principal feature of the proceedings was a grand inaugural concert in the large central hall in the afternoon—one of six concerts of similar quality to be given during the next few months. There was an orchestra and chorus of 1,100 performers, ably conducted by Mr. F. J. Haydn Millars, the newly-appointed musical director, with Mr. T. W. Henderson at the large organ. The solo vocalists were Madame Antoinette Sterling, Madame Clara Samuell, Miss Alice Suter, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Foli. The concert opened with the National Anthem, with full band and chorus, and closed with a fine rendering of the "Hallelujah Chorus" by the choir.

Miss Vera Beringer, the daughter of the famous pianist, who made such a sensation in the piece written by her mother, favourably noticed at the time in the MUSICAL WORLD, had another opportunity of showing her exceptional talents in Mrs. Hodgson-Burnett's "The Real Little Lord Fauntleroy," at Terry's Theatre. One of the most severe theatrical critics says of her:—"Miss Vera Beringer, who takes the part, is a child-actress of really marvellous talent. Her little speeches, which are more numerous than anybody else's, seem to combine the artlessness of the nursery with the skill of the Conservatoire; she has been given an unexampled opportunity of boring the public, and she has delighted them as few adult actresses, even under the most favourable circumstances, can do."

An exhibition of Mr. Edison's new phonograph, especially in the reproduction of singing and the sounds of musical instruments, was given on Friday afternoon at the inventor's laboratory. The Daily News' correspondent says that experiments were made with the piano, violin, cornet, and clarionet, separately and together. For many weeks the inventor has been at work adapting the instrument to music. For recording the music of the piano a funnel of cardboard 5ft. long and 2ft. in diameter at the bell, was placed with the bell above the strings of the piano and the small end at the mouthpiece of the phonograph. The version of some chords and a polka was clear, distinct, and musical. Even the vibration of the strings when the chord was struck was perfectly audible, and the result loud enough and musical enough to give pleasure to a sensitive ear. With the funnel for magnifying the sound placed on the machine, the music sounded as the music of a piano might coming through a thick partition. Every note could be heard, but much of the musical effect was lost. The phonograph's reproduction of music was invariably a trifle sharper in pitch than the original. Of the different instruments tried, the cornet gave back the loudest and clearest tones, easily distinguished twenty or thirty feet from the diaphragm.

In the Exhibition mania which is at present rampant, music is involved more or less. At the opening of the Italian Exhibition Madame Nordica scored a great success in the inaugural hymn written specially for the occasion by Tito Mattei, and dedicated, as we announced last week, to the Prince of Naples. The work is brilliantly scored, and serves its occasional purpose well. At the Danish Exhibition the musical proceedings were of a very mild kind, Madame Albani singing "Home, sweet home," and Madame Otta Brönnum, clad in the Amager costume, a Danish song of the patriotic type.

The late Mr. Julian Adams, the well-known musical composer and conductor, has bequeathed a sum of six hundred pounds to Trinity College, London, for the establishment of a prize for students in musical composition.

A very interesting artistic event will be celebrated on the 26th of this month. On that day it will be exactly 40 years since Julius Stockhausen, the great vocalist, appeared for the first time in public, singing the "Elijah," at Basle. By a curious coincidence, it happens that in the same month, 25 years ago, Stockchausen became a Schubert singer par excellence, in which capacity he remains unrivalled to this day. It was in May, 1863, that Stockhausen sang, for the first time, the entire cycles, "Die Schöne Müllerin," and "Die Winterreise," at Vienna, a feat, at that time, unprecedented.

His pupils and innumerable friends and admirers are making great preparations for the occasion. At his house in Frankfort a festival play, specially written by Otto Roquette, will be performed, and there is also a talk of singing one of Brahms's new Quartets, provided the publisher will lend the MS. for the occasion. In addition to this, it is intended to present the great artist with a handsome testimonial, contributions to which should be sent without delay to Messrs. Steyl and Thomas, Music Publishers, Frankfort-on-Maine.

Selection day at the Handel Festival will this time be of more than ordinary interest, a number of works little known and never heard at these festivals being included in the programme. Amongst these we may mention Concerto for Organ (Mr. W. T. Best) and Orchestra, No. 7, in B flat (1733); Invocation, "Jehovah Crowned" (Madame Trebelli) and chorus, "He comes," from "Esther" (1720); overture, chorus, "Oh! first created beam," and air, "Thy glorious deeds" (Mr. Santley), from "Samson" (1742); overture and Saraband, from "Almira" (1705); aria, "Del minacciar del Vento (Mr. Santley) from "Ottone" (1727); and a selection from "The triumph of Time and Truth" (1757).

M. Lalo's opera, "Le Roi d'Ys," was, after many delays, produced at the Opera Comique, Paris, on Monday last week. The libretto, by M. Blau, is founded upon the Breton legend of a city submerged by the sea for the sins of its inhabitants. That legend, of course, has been considerably amplified and developed for dramatic purposes, and the love element has, after the French fashion, been treated with great prominence.

M. Lalo's music was written many years ago, and parts of it, notably the overture, had been frequently heard at concerts. The composer steers a kind of middle way between the Wagnerian system, to which he naturally inclines, and the craving for tunes, duets, trios, and other set pieces which the French taste demands. One of the most charming numbers of the score is the chorus, "Noël! Noël!" at the beginning of the first act. A cantilana, "En silence pourquois souffrir," for mezzo-soprano, charmingly sung by Mdlle. Simmonet, was also amongst the successes of the evening. The principal parts were taken by Mdlle. Deschamps and M. Talazac.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

(Mr. Mackenzie's Address, Continued.)

You have met me during the past week for the first time as the conductor of the music of this school, and it is that particular office to which I look to give me a full knowledge of your individual talents as well as of your collective capabilities. When I have made acquaintance with those among you who are sufficiently advanced to be entrusted with the bâton, and to whom a knowledge of conducting is likely to be of service later, I mean to let them try their "'prentice hand" here as often as possible. Doubtless there are many students who look forward to be placed at the head of choirs or even larger choral bodies. To such, I know, few opportunities are given of acquiring the necessary experience; and I hope in time to be able to make arrangements for that study in some special manner. Some of you may be placed in positions as organists in churches, and many more may, at least, come into close connection with those who exercise an influence over church music. This particular style of composition is, perhaps, the only one which we can, with distinct right and pride, claim as our own, and as emanating directly from our English soil; and I think it our duty to help to provide for its perpetuation, or at least to give the future organist a full and proper knowledge of its great importance. For this purpose I propose systematically and regularly to turn the attention of our choir to the works of the English church writers. I think I may safely expect that we shall overcome the difficulties of one specimen every fortnight, selecting afterwards the most promising performance for our public concert programmes. The organist in England has a great responsibility upon him. It is through him that in smaller towns and villages the taste for music is formed. What sort of taste that may ultimately turn out to be depends very much upon the organist and choirmaster. Surely it is our duty to give him every chance of developing his own taste in a proper direction, and I should like much to organise a class for the study of church music and the training of our choirmasters. All the more do I think this necessary, because, so far as I am aware, the young organist may at present look about him in vain for an institution in which he can prepare himself for his special duties in connection with church services. On this point I hope to be able to speak more definitely on another occasion.

As regards opera, we may be able to help the neglected cause of our English opera by giving some further attention to the already organised operatic class. Whether that class will fulfil its obligations, and answer the purpose for which it was originally started, depends very much upon the vocalists here. There are, no doubt, many of you who would willingly study the more important parts in opera; but can I be quite so sure that as many will be content, at first, to join in the "harmless, necessary" chorus? We must have rank and file as well as officers, and you must not expect to have the chance of ever coming forward if the operatic class be allowed to drift into a sickly condition for want of a little esprit de corps. The class enjoyed the special attention of the late Principal, and will, I trust, in the future, fulfil the good intentions for which he formed it. Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro," a few nights ago, proved very clearly the claims of the scheme upon the attention of a national institution like this, by showing the talent of those who took part in the performance. No help of mine shall be spared to assist the class, and I look to you in connection with this matter to think least of yourselves, more of others, and most of the institution.

Those students who have seats in our orchestra have to consider their duties to themselves and us. To the future soloist an orchestral training is of the greatest value—it sharpens the ear, quickens the sense for rhythm, assists the agility of finger and eye. The musician who reads quickly at first sight has many advantages over your slower readers, and the orchestra affords the very best chance of acquiring this gift. While I am not likely to forget to take you through the orchestral works of the great masters in music, I mean to put before you some examples of modern work with which I wish you to become familiar, choosing such pieces as I may consider suited to your comprehensions in your stage of musical advancement, and within your capabilities as executants. There are some works by Raff, Brahms, and Dvorāk, which will answer my purpose at present; and future choice will be governed entirely by the growth of your ability to master the practical difficulties as well as to understand the intellectual qualities of those compositions with which you, sooner or later, must form an intimate acquaintance.

I wish to give all students here an ample opportunity of studying the scores of the masters, ancient and modern. For this purpose a further extension of the R.A.M. library will have to be seriously considered. A library is a thing of never-ending growth, and its formation is a matter of time. Luckily, however, here is a work in which many may join, and I am certainly not ashamed, in this particular case, to ask for outside assistance. Through the kindness and brotherly feeling of some friends, a beginning has been already made. But I do not wish to limit the munificence of intending donors to musical works alone. Biography, historical works, treatises on special branches are at all times necessary to the student of our art. Subject to certain rules, such book should be always accessible to him.

I do not wish to subject myself to the sarcastic reflection "The gentleman protests too much, methinks," and further I am very well aware that while the plans which I shall constantly nurse are strictly in accordance with the idea that has always shown itself as dominant in the minds of my predecessors —viz., the progress and usefulness of the Royal Academy of Music—they naturally require time and watchful care before they can attain that maturity by which alone they can be of real service to our cause. After a time I may expect to be asked the question: Have we been able to carry out all these plans, and have they resulted in satisfactory progress towards a comprehensive and perfect education of young professional musicians? With the help of those with whom I have the privilege of sharing this work, and who hold equally responsible positions here with myself, I do hope to be able to answer —Yes. I hope to be able to point to the students here as a body of living examples of our earnest work—and that by unceasing application to your general studies, and the development of your particular gifts, some of you will enable me to single you out as exceptional specimens of that musical talent the possession of which some nations are disposed to deny to us at the present day. In spite of the many disquieting and irritating statements to that effect, I should be sorry indeed to think that we are in the future to take any but a high position among the so-called musical nations. Our early musical history speaks strongly and loudly in our favour, and you must one and all remember that some day it may be within your power to add a resonant note to the full score which is to represent the music of our country. To this end you are here, for this purpose we work together. Apart from the consideration of the fact that you intend adopting music as your honourable profession, believe me, the serious study of the art will repay you in many ways. It is worthy your devotion for itself alone. I presume you have already made up your minds that your life is to be given to music, and that without music you cannot live. Let me quote to you a keen expression of regret from the autobiography of a man whose learning and great powers of research made him famous, I mean Charles Darwin:—

"My mind seems to have become a kind of machine for grinding general laws out of large collections of facts. . . If I had to live my life again, I would have made a rule to read some poetry and listen to some music at least once every week. . . . The loss of these tastes is a loss of happiness, and may possibly be injurious to the intellect, and more probably to the moral character, by enfeebling the emotional part of our nature."

Surely words like these, deliberately written by a man of such great, and at the same time, such thoroughly practical intellect as Darwin, are in themselves a testimony of the lofty and worthy nature of the art to which we devote ourselves, and of the importance of that art in the work of the world. Surely the striving to attain an honourable place in that art is a laudable object of ambition, and a direct and constant stimulus to that persistent and conscientious devotion to his work in which the student will find the best guarantee for solid and honest success.

In conclusion, I would earnestly ask you, one and all, to carry away with you the following precepts, designated as his golden rules, by one who certainly had the best right to be heard on such a subject—one to whose life-work every one of us has been at some time or other indebted alike for instruction and enjoyment—Charles Dickens. He says: "I never could have done what I have done without the habits of punctuality, order, and diligence, without the determination to concentrate myself on one object at a time which I then formed. Heaven knows I write this in no spirit of self-laudation. . . . My meaning simply is that whatever I have tried to do in life, I have tried to do well; that whatever I have devoted myself to, I have devoted myself to completely, and that in great aims and in small I have always been thoroughly in earnest. I have never believed it possible that any natural or improved ability can claim immunity from the companionship of the steady, plain, hardworking qualities, and hope to gain its end. There is no such thing as such fulfilment on this earth. Some happy talent, some fortunate opportunity may form the two sides of the ladder on which some men mount, but the rounds of that ladder must be made of stuff to stand wear and tear; and there is no substitute for thorough-going, ardent, and sincere earnestness." Can there be any stronger incentive to exertion? Here we have the earnest, practical man of science acknowledging the usefulness and even the necessity of the solace that music can give to the spirit; and, on the other hand, the great master of imagination energetically declaring the necessity of bringing to the endeavour for success, in an imaginative art, the practical, persevering qualities of this working-day world!

Miss Hope Glenn will be the contralto for the Festival at Worcester, Mass, to be held September 24th to 28th. On Tuesday last, Mr. Healey, her agent, cabled her acceptance of engagement.

VOCAL.

We receive from Pitt and Hatzfeld "The King of Denmark's Ride," by Mary Carmichael, many of whose charming songs have been heard from time to time in our concert rooms. The words, a translation from the Danish, by the Hon. Mrs. Norton, give ample opportunity for varied treatment in the musical expression, and this the composer has turned to account with genuine artistic feeling, the hurry and movement of the opening affording especially an excellent contrast with the pathos of the last verse. Needless to say that this is altogether superior in tone and workmanship to the conventional society song; and it is sure to find favour with vocalists of cultivated taste.

The Viaduct Publishing Company send various songs, in estimating the merits of which it is necessary to keep in view the popular character manifestly aimed at. Within such limits, praise may be accorded to a song with the not very original title "Sing it again," by Odoardo Barri, and to "Midsummer Eve: a Legend," by Michael Watson, the fanciful subject of which has been treated with fair success. Both these songs are likely to prove a welcome addition to the drawing-room singer's collection. There are good qualities also in "Oh, Love, Come Back," by Henry Parker, the opening melody of which is decidedly taking; in a pretty song, entitled "The Silver Stream," by John Denham; and in an "Ave Maria" and a ballad entitled "Only in dreams," both by Clement Douglas. In the latter case the composer has considerately anticipated the requirements of vocalists of either sex by supplying alternative possessive-pronouns in such lines as "And then his (her) darling face I see"—an attention which will no doubt be appreciated by those concerned. There is an agreeable flow in the melody of "At Dusk," by Edwin H. Prout. "I only tried your heart," by Donald Edmonstone, is a narrative song of more sprightly character. (All the above same publishers.)

Of an altogether different class from the foregoing are "Three songs by Sydney Shaw" (Charles Woolhouse), consisting of settings of poems by Byron ("Farewell, if ever fondest prayer," and "She walks in beauty") and of Pope's ode, "Vital spark of heavenly flame," all written with musicianly aim, and possessing interest in about equal degree. The composer has chosen rather an elaborate treatment of Pope's familiar verses, but several of his effects, to which the pianoforte accompaniment contributes its full share, are well conceived, and both this and the companion songs are admirably written throughout. The force of old associations is strong enough to cause Sir C. Sedley's verses, "Phyllis is my only joy," to sound strange in any new setting, and although Mr. J. Cliffe Forrester has in "Phyllis" written a song of some merit, and has managed to steer clear of reminiscences, it is doubtful whether many who sing or hear it will be equally successful in the latter respect. "Secret Faith," by C. Graves-Irwin, must rely for favour upon the admirers of commonplace, and their name is legion. "Mabelle" is a well-written song of moderate interest, by C. Saint-George. (All the above Charles Woolhouse.)

The London Music Publishing Company send a pleasantly tuneful song, "Bubbles," by Lady Borton. In "Guidance," by Henry T. Tiltman (Patey and Willis), good intention has been attended with only moderate success in the treatment of really poetical words. "'Neath rosy bower" (H. Klein), by Louis Honig, affords opportunities for vocal display in various florid passages not often nowadays introduced in drawing-room songs. "The Toilers," by M. Piccolomini (same publisher) is a song in which strong effects—including the description of a mining explosion and a shipwreck—are aimed at by means of decidedly mild musical material, nor should we wish it to be otherwise. The claims of the tender sentiment have been duly vindicated in a pleasing song by Henry Klein, entitled "Love's rebuke" (same publisher).

A graceful, musicianly setting, in a madrigal for six voices, of Shelley's words, "Music, when soft voices die," has been contributed by Alfred King (Novello, Ewer, and Co.), and by the same composer we have also a Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in B flat (London Music Publishing Company). Mr. Sinclair Dunn has issued a useful little instruction book for singing classes, entitled "The Music Class; or Sight Singer" (same publishers).

We have also a good vocal duet for contralto and baritone, by Erskine Allon, entitled, "Who is Sylvia?" the words from Shakespeare (London Music Publishing Company); "A fruitless question," part-song, of fair interest, by F. A. Onslow (Novello Ewer, and Co.), and a Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis for even' ing service by Henry Smith (Hart and Co.).

INSTRUMENTAL.

Mr. Charles Woolhouse sends two good pianoforte pieces by Herbert F. Sharpe—"The Mill Wheel" and "L'Absence," the first of which is particularly effective; and "Souvenir" and a "Caprice" in D minor, by Wilfred Davies, both well written, and exhibiting fluency of musical idea. Though it begins characteristically, a "Bolero," by Sydney Shaw, certainly shows a disposition at times to relapse into an English style; but otherwise it makes a pleasing piece. "La Giocaza," by G. Saint-George, is a "danse Italienne" of the tarantella type. (All same publisher.) "Allegrezza," a rondo for the pianoforte, by Cécile Hartog (Robert Cocks and Co.), possesses decided musical interest, and is spirited and clearly constructed. No. 1 of Mr. Oscar Beringer's useful series of "Easy Classics for the Pianoforte" (Stanley Lucas and Co.), contains a transcription for that instrument of the Moderato from Haydn's quartet in G, No. 59. The same publishers send "Solo Bryllup," or "Silver Wedding," a spirited March by Frances Copleston. Another March of more pretension, is "Noon: Grand Parade March" (Viaduct Publishing Company), by Edwin H. Prout, which is musicianly in style, and makes an effective pianoforte piece. We further receive from the Viaduct Publishing Company a selection of pianoforte pieces, well suited for players of moderate skill. They may be classed together as likely to find various degrees of favour in schoolroom and drawing-room, and the question of their relative merits may be fairly left to the decision of particular tastes:—"A Day-Dream," reverie, by Arthur Argo; "Dance of the Goblins," by E. Boggetti; "En Barquette," barcarolle, by Luigi Berrardi; "Enchantment," rondo schottische, by Carl Malemberg; "Victory!" grand march, for piano, by Arthur Argo; "Golden Ray," gavotte, by the same composer; and "Ma Fiancée," by Theo. Bonheur.

Also received from Charles Woolhouse a "Berceuse," for pianoforte, and 'cello, violin, and viola, by Charles Victor. It has for a second title "Fitful Slumbers," which explains the assignment to the solo instrument of two distinct themes, labelled respectively, "The Mother," "The Child." The domestic associations, not always of the most agreeable kind, thus raised are quite pleasantly treated in the music, and the result is a sufficiently effective piece. Amateurs will also find a pleasing solo for violin, with pianoforte accompaniment, in "Chant d'Amour, by G. Saint-George (same publisher).

BOOKS.

Examination of a little "Grammar of Harmony," by J. Hunt Cooke (Alexander and Shepheard) has been attended by disappointment of an agreeable kind. Instead of offering one of those meagre and purposeless rechauffées of larger works, to which certain professors are fond of seeing their names attached, the writer has in some respects fairly made good his claim to greater simplicity and a more logical grouping of the laws of musical chords. There can be no doubt that the study of harmony is often made unnecessarily irksome and perplexing to beginners by over-elaborating in its early stage, rules the reasons for which cannot be explained until later on. By familiarising himself at the outset with the structure of the harmonic scale as far as the ninth, the pupil obtains at once a general view of the work that lies before him, and, instead of working in the dark, is thus in a position to attack the smaller combinations, and the treatment of their parts more intelligently and therefore with greater ease. Sterndale Bennett used to say, "All that is essential about harmony may be written upon half a sheet of paper." We are not aware whether he left that half-sheet; but the implied protest against the over-elaboration of what is in reality a simple matter will obtain sympathetic response among many who remember the circuitous path along which they were condemned to toil during their student days, in what might have been made a comparatively short journey. On the other hand, it is doubtful whether the new names suggested for the notes of the scale are not likely to bewilder rather than assist beginners, while there will be no difficulty, for example, in the case of an educated musician, to understand the author's motive in substituting the term "minor subdominant" for the more familiar "supertonic," "minor dominant," for the "mediant," and so on. This change of nomenclature, by which some of the tunes are associated with the major scale, and others with its relative minor, is scarcely to be recommended in the early phase of study to which the little book avowedly addresses itself; especially considering that the more generally used terms will, of necessity, have to be mastered before proceeding to larger works on the subject. "Musical Pictures," by Isabella Fletcher (William Reeves) is another attempt, but of a more elementary kind, to smooth and brighten the path of musical study. It treats of scales, intervals, and the simpler harmonic combinations in a conversational style, suited, in some parts, to a nursery, but with a side glance, perhaps, from time to time, towards older readers. Explanations of scales and intervals are enlivened by pretty little word pictures, and suggested analogies drawn from natural scenery and familiar objects. It may be called, in fact, a sort of musical "Peep of Day," and in these times, when we my expect shortly to see scientific "primers" studied in perambulators, perhaps the experiment is worth a trial. Do such sentences, however, as "You can hear how funny its (the minor scales) last notes sound," &c., really hasten the acquirement of hard, dry facts, which, after all, will scarcely be assimilated by young people without a certain amount of real mental labour?

Messrs. Cassell and Co. are issuing a new edition of Emil Naumann's "History of Music," translated by F. Praeger, to be completed in forty-one monthly parts. The first number contains, in addition to various small engravings, a beautifully-executed page of thirteenth century musical MS. from the library of the medical faculty at Montpellier, and a no less interesting facsimile of Beethoven's writing from the original in the possession of the Society of the Friends of Music at Vienna. To judge from the style in which this first number is executed, the work bids fair, when completed, to make a handsome and attractive volume; and, considering the merits of the illustrations alone, it is a marvel of cheapness.

The Organ World.

ON REGISTERING.

V.

In the last contribution to this subject, the art of stop-changing was formulated as under the heads: organic, antiphonal, and rhythmical; and further as involving duties connected with the illustration of form outlines, making clear contrapuntal activity, and setting forth orchestral or typical, imitative idioms coming under the department spoken of nowadays as tone-colour. These topics were briefly touched upon; still, there is much more to be said respecting some of these departments, but before doing this, it may be well to advance one or two thoughts having a general bearing in connection with the subject at large.

Undoubtedly registering has changed greatly in modern times, very much as orchestration has been quickened and vivified into a new science. There are those who protest against the, at times, feverish pursuit of tone-colour effects; and unquestionably there is in this, as in every art impulse, danger of excess, only to be checked by study and experience, which result in the formation of sound judgment. All the same, artistic life, like every phase of existence, is quickened from time to time in given directions, and in music the application and combination of varied tone qualities is one of the most remarkable characteristics of the art progress of the present century. Despite the calm region of organic thought, this tendency has not unnaturally reached the instrument presumably most free from the hurry and excitement of the more feverish impulses of the art world. The history of music, however, strangely links the progress of organ music with the corresponding advance being made in orchestral art. This dual and attendant method of development goes on, notwithstanding the fact that the orchestra is for the most part employed in the concert-room and dramatic expositions of the art, whilst the organ finds its most constant and permanent use within the solemn, useful regions of sacred art. But in truth, human emotions vary little, and undergo but little change, if any, under the influence of locality, object, or fashion. So it is that in the story of music we find orchestration and registering on the organ following nearly the same lines. In Bach's time whole movements were written for a selected group of instruments, just as we may presume entire movements were often played upon the same stops of the organ. Then we find the tone-colour of organ music clearly affected by the symphonic period of German art. And once more we note variety, breadth, and intensity of tone as heard on the orchestra, followed and imitated—this last word not necessarily indicating a slavish prostration of organic effect—by the king of instruments, which is none the less endowed with an individuality and dignity all its own, and unapproachable even by the orchestra in certain, it may be limited, directions.

STORY OF THE OLD ORGAN IN THE CATHEDRAL "BEATÆ MARIÆ VIRGINIS," IN WOLFENBUTTEL.

III.

Written from information in existing documents by Selmar Muller, and translated by F. E. T.

It is evident from this specification that pains were taken to secure for the large church an organ, not only of powerful and dignified tone, but also one capable of the utmost variety of effect. But before proceeding, it may be well to offer a correction; in last week's portion of this account the word "Swell" was, by a clerical and inadvertent error, substituted for Oberwerk or Upper Manual. Organ building in the time of Fritsche was to a large extent a matter of individual taste, and had not been placed on a scientific basis as in the present century. It is to this imperfect development of the art to that one must attribute the failure of the good people of Wolfenbüttel in erecting an organ worthy of their cathedral.

An excess of screaming mutation stops and absurd imitative fancy stops acted prejudicially on the whole organ; even the tremulant is represented on two manuals. It seems strange that the third manual, the choir, should have been the most successful in result; a superiority maintained in all subsequent enlargements and repairs of the organ. The only foundation stops in the scheme already given were of 8 and 16 feet tone, and were still to be found in the specification of 1726.

It may be explained that these foundation stops, principal and sub-bass (Rohrflöte) did not extend to the great C, but to the lower F, as in the old English organs, a fact sufficiently shown by the size of the pipes. The kettle-drums mentioned in the former account were, of course, not a part of the organ, but were probably supplied by the organ-builder. It is interesting to note that these kettle-drums are still in existence, and are of very large circumference.

The second document is a contract made with the organ-builder on February 21st, 1620, in which he binds himself "to complete the organ, in accordance with the specification and a model agreed upon, with the utmost artistic, complete, and ornamental perfection by Easter, 1621." For this he was to receive 1,374 thalers, and 10 thalers for a cask of ale, these sums to be paid in two instalments.

THE ORGAN AND THE CLASSICS.

A Lecture given by Frank J. Sawyer, D. Mus. Oxon., F.C.O.

Part II.

It is now nearly twelve months ago that I undertook, in blissful ignorance of the task I had given myself, to lay before you some facts on the relations of our great classic composers on the organ. On the former occasion I exhausted the whole of our time in tracing the position of Handel and Bach in their life and writings to our beloved instrument. By the kindness of the Council of our College, I am now invited to carry our researches on towards a termination, by reviewing the lives of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Schumann, and showing in what way these various great classic writers were associated with the organ. Firstly, let us take Haydn. Let me, by way of comment, point that from a chronological view of their chief works, the positions of Haydn and Mozart ought always to be reversed. True, Haydn was born in 1733, and Mozart not till 1756, but if you will examine the dates of Haydn's greatest works you will find the Salomon Symphonies in 1791 (the year of Mozart's death), the "Creation" 1798, and the "Seasons" 1799. In reality, therefore, we should put Mozart first in chronological order, and Haydn second, and should also speak more of Mozart's influence on Haydn, than of Haydn's influence on Mozart.

As regards our work to-night, almost the whole of Haydn's acquaintance with the organ occurred during his youth. It is not necessary for me to sketch his life, his birth at Rohrau, his choristership at the Cathedral of S. Stephen, at Vienna, the loss of his voice, and his expulsion from the choir for cutting off a boy's pigtail, his early struggles, and subsequent success in the service of Prince Esterhazy. We first find the organ making a deep impression on his youthful mind when, as a choir boy, we are told that he "crept into the cathedral as soon as he heard the organ, the management of which for years, and quite unaided, he had taught himself." Reutter, who also knew him at this time, told Fux "he played finely on the organ, and in composition showed promise." How, when, or where he learnt, or taught himself, we find no record, but doubtless, like many a precocious youth, by dint of carefully watching, he soon made himself acquainted with the general ideas of organ management.

By the way, it may interest some of our cathedral organists to know what care was taken of the Vienna choir boys, even to the allowance of 1⅓ siedl of wine (about 1½ pints), but such that the boys —"nit darum Khrankh werden"—(not such as to make the boys ill ! !)

As a choir boy, Haydn's brother Michael seems to have surpassed Joseph in organ playing, for he even deputized for the cathedral organist, and received a groschen (2d.) a time for it, till at last pride in his vocation made him strike for seven kreuzers a service.

After the unhappy period of his voice breaking, and of his expulsion from St. Stephen's choir, poor Hadyn must have suffered greatly from privation. It is not until he was 23 that we again meet with him in connection with the organ; then Mendel tells us that between 1755 and 1758 he was appointed Vorspieler (? deputy) in the Barmherzige Brudern Church in the Leopoldstadt, with a salary of 60 gulden a year (£5).

He played on Sundays and festivals at 10 in the chapel of Count Haugwitz, and sang at 11 in St. Stephen's, at High Mass.

Here we see, then, old Father Hadyn grinding along in the regular routine of a church organist, yet there is no doubt that, considering his nature and the subsequent development of his great talent in so widely different a direction, he was not "to the manner born." To those of us living to-day, these lives of—shall I say—wearying monotony and regularity, it seems hard to picture the writer of the "Creation" and the father of the Symphony, having done the same before us.

From this time on we fail in Haydn's life, to find for many years any trace of connection with the organ until 1773. He was then the chief feature in the musical life of that wonderful place that Prince Esterhazy had erected for himself. On the death of the organist—Franz Nowsky—organist of the Castle Church at Eisenstadt, Haydn took the post, but, I regret to say, made the village schoolmaster his deputy in the summer, and sent someone else to play for him in the winter, agreeing with the schoolmaster that he (Jos. Diezl) might have the salary (probably a very small sum), while he (Haydn) took the perquisites, which consisted of 300 lb. of beef, 50 lb. of salt, 30 lb. of lard, 36 lb. of candles, 4 metzen of wheat, ¾ of griess, 12 of corn, ½ eimer of seeds and roots, 9 eimers of officerwine, and 6 klafters of firewood! There is little doubt who had the best of that bargain.

These are all the references we find in the long and useful life of Haydn connecting him with the organ. As I have before intimated, though a devout Catholic and earnest man, the bent of his genius turned him into the realm of secular music, where he so greatly excelled; and though, of course, he has left many specimens of church music, from Masses downwards, yet one cannot say they represented Haydn at his best.

Amongst his instrumental compositions, on two only does the word organ occur. In 1763 he wrote two concerti, with violin, viola, and bass accompaniment, marked in Haydn's catalogue as "Concerto per l'organo—" "e ancora altri due concerti per l'Organo in C."

Of the first of these, Pohl writes: "This concerto is very long (533 bars). First movement (allegro moderato), largo, allegro moderato. The style of this movement has nothing of a church character. It is just like the others, and could only be used as postlude to a service. Haydn's powers as organist can be as little proved from this work as from the obbligatos so rich in the taste of that period, and in the thoughtfully elaborated organ accompaniments to his E flat Mass, and to the little and much-esteemed Mass in B flat major..

Taking the former of these, the Mass in E flat—the score of which is unfortunately not published—Pohl tells us there is an "antiquated organ part, treated in concert-fashion, which, however, is only written out in the Benedictus."

While to the little B flat Mass called, I believe, the small organ mass, there is again an organ obbligato in the same movement—the Benedictus—described by Pohl as "a devoutly conceived soprano solo, lightly accompanied by strings. The organ is here treated for the first time obbligato, but, excepting in the prelude, it obtains no prominence elsewhere than in the interludes to the voice part. It is again in the same antiquated, florid style which we meet in the E flat Mass, but milder in form."

But, perhaps, better known than either of these is the "Et incarnatus" from the larger B flat Mass (No. 4), where occurs a passage for organ marked "flutino," and consisting of an elegant figure in demisemiquavers.

In summarizing our researches, we find that Haydn taught himself the organ when a boy, and from 23 to 25 occupied an organist's post, but that apparently his sympathies where not greatly with his duties.

I now turn to his contemporary, Mozart. You will remember that on a former occasion I endeavoured to interest you for a whole evening with the consideration of Mozart as an organist and writer for the organ.

On that occasion, as you may recollect, I had the pleasure of performing to you some of the almost unknown organ sonatas, with string accompaniment, by Mozart. After having dealt, therefore, already as exhaustively as was possible on this subject, I shall only, for the sake of consecutiveness, give a brief summary of what our researches then yielded us.

Leopold Mozart, the father of Wolfgang, was an excellent organist, and thus the little prodigy was also a good performer on the instrument, and was, during his early but triumphant Italian journey, admired as much as an organist, as an harpichordist.

SUNDAY MUSIC.

Speaking of "Sunday Attractions," a writer in the Echo observes: "Perhaps I am led to this topic by an incident which I witnessed the other Sunday night at Hammersmith. It so chanced that I was in that district, and that, attracted by the beauty of the edifice, I strolled into the parish church of St. Paul's. Of its marble pillars, of its grand proportions, of its admirable service, I need here say nothing. To me the interesting fact was what occurred after choir and clergymen had left the building, and the congregation should have dispersed, the vast congregation sat still, while the well-known organist, Mr. Theodore Drew, gave a recital of sacred music on what, for quality of tone, is one of the best organs in London. Not merely the rich or 'respectable' people stayed there. Many of the people who sat enthralled by the music belonged to no class except the lower one—the class that is popularly supposed to have no ear for high, grave compositions; and it was not until the last solemn tones of that mellifluous instrument ceased that these 'ignorant persons' got up and reverently left.

"'What a people we Londoners are!' I thought, as I quitted the sacred fane; we have in a thousand churches powerful organs presided over by clever men that are only used to play what is called a 'voluntary,' a hymn tune, an anthem, or a chant. And yet there are hundreds of thousands of human beings in our vast Metropolis in search of something that shall be a substitute for the public-house and the street corner. What are the clergy about? Why should not they, their choirs, and their organists, give a sacred concert every Sunday evening after the services of the day are concluded; and thus offer high entertainment to myriads of people?"

REVIEWS.

Motet for 40 voices. Thomas Tallis. Edited by Dr. H. Mann, Mus. Doc. (Weekes and Co., 14, Hanover Street, W.). Students will be grateful to Dr. Mann and his spirited publishers for placing Tallis's marvellous piece of part-writing before them, even though the work must in future, as in the past, be chiefly one to contemplate. There are those, however, who remember to have taken part in an attempt to perform the Motet under John Hullah's direction, some thirty-five years ago. It is written for eight choirs of five parts each, and set to Latin words. Dr. Mann has judiciously modernised the notation, and given the G cleff for the two upper parts of each choir. His work has been done with musicianly care, and with true antiquarian love of a venerated original.

Original Organ Compositions.—George F. Vincent (W. J. Willcocks and Co., 63, Berners Street). Several books are out of these well written pieces, which display great talent, and the power of utilising organic effects. The different movements consist of the usual organ forms, preludes, interludes, &c. The "Grand Offertoire in F" is the longest, and in some respects the most effective, of the collection. Mr. Vincent, though writing with a decided inclination to the modern school, which treats the instrument in somewhat orchestral fashion, displays solid taste, and a due recognition of the received idioms and technicalities which painstaking writers and good organ-players faithfully respect.

ORGANISTS AND THE CLERGY.

10, Harvey Road, Cambridge.

SIR,—I sincerely hope that the suggestion of your correspondent, "Phaon," will be taken up by the College of Organists, if not by all the leading music schools which teach organ players and choir trainers. The question is quite as serious with regard to the relations of precentors and cathedral organists, as it is in the case of parish work. Not infrequently, to avoid friction, the organist has to concur in selections of music of which he entirely disapproves. The great works of the English school are being rapidly forgotten, because the precentors, who choose the music or have a veto in the choice, are ignorant of their contents, or incapable of appreciating them. In losing its traditions, the School of English Cathedral music will assuredly decline.

I can speak from personal experience in the matter; for although the University of Cambridge has appointed me its authority on matters musical, I have no voice whatever in the selection of music at Trinity College Chapel, where I am organist. None the less am I held responsible for the music performed, by those who do not know the inscrutable ways of choir foundations. Of the two courses open to me, a nominal supervision without any real control and entire abstention, I, as most others would do, choose the latter, rather than accept the responsibility of a policy fatal to church music in the country.

Yours faithfully,

May 5th, 1888. C. VILLIERS STANFORD.

RECITAL NEWS.

Mr. J. W. Wilson's new Church oratorio, "The Earthly and Heavenly Harvest," was produced for the first time at S. Mary Magdalene's Church, Wandsworth Common, at the eight o'clock special evening service on Tuesday, April 10th, with orchestral accompaniment and augmented choir.

ALBERT HALL.—An organ recital was given by Mr. Reginald Steggall, A.C.O., on April 27th. The following is the programme:—Toccata and Fugue in D minor, J. S. Bach; Communion in F, Grison; Barracole, Mr. S. Bennett; Judex (Mors et Vita), Gounod; Andante in G, Reginald Steggall; Communion in E flat, Batiste; Andante in A flat, W. S. Hoyte; "The King of Love," Gounod; Allegro assai vivace, Sonata 1, Mendelssohn.

BISLEY CHURCH, WOKING.—A recital was recently given on the occasion of opening a two-manual organ, by Mr. D. Bradfield, of New, College, Oxon., F.C.O., organist of St. Mary's, Bryanston Square. The following were the principal items of the programme:—Prelude and Fugue, D minor, Bach; Mendelssohn's 3rd Sonata; Adagio, E major, Guilmant; La Carita, Rossini; Prelude in G, Mendelssohn; Several Lieder Ohne Worte, Mendelssohn. During the interval the Rector, Rev. J. Cater, B. Mus., gave a short history of the organ.

An organ recital was given on April 25th, at Upper Norwood Congregational Church, by Mr. Ferdinand L. Dunkley, F.C.O. (recently appointed organist and choirmaster), assisted by Mr. Arthur Roddis (tenor), and the Choir of the Church. The programme is subjoined:—Overture (occasional oratorio), Handel; Chorale with variations, Smart; Romanza ("La Reine de France" symphony), Hadyn; Pastorale, Kullak; Fugue in G minor, Bach: Autumn song, spring song, C. W. Pearce; Sonata in D, Mendelssohn; Allegretto tranquillo (piano and violin Sonata in G), Greig; Offertoire in D minor, Batiste.

ST. PETER'S CHURCH, BIRKLEY, LOWESTOFT.—An organ recital was given on May 1st, by F. de G. English, Esq., B.A., A.C.O., organist of Parish Church, Godalming. The programme had the following organ pieces:—Allegro mastoso in F minor (Sonata 1), Mendelssohn; Andante in E minor, Smart; Prelude, Fugue in A minor, Bach; Overture, "Last seven words," Haydn; Andante grazioso in G, Smart; Adagio (sonata pathètique), Beethoven; Nazareth, Gounod.

CHRIST CHURCH, HENDON.—Programme of an organ recital given by Mr. H. A. Wheeldon, F.C.O., on April 29th:—Andante, Klein; Offertoire in F (on a French carol), J. Grison; Meditation, E. Lemaigre; March in D, Deshayes.

LEAMINGTON.—At St. John's Church, the sixteenth organ recital was given on May 5th, by Mr. Yates Mander, Fellow of the College of Organists and Licentiate of the Royal Academy of Music. Violins, Messrs. H. A. Heden and W. Warren; viola, Mr. Yates Mander; 'cello, Mr. H. Mander. The programme included:—Larghetto from Symphony, No. 2, Beethoven; Scherzo in A minor, Best; String quartet (Andante and Minuet), Haydn; Overture to "Athalie," Mendelssohn; Pastorale, Kullak; String quartet ("God preserve the Emperor," Haydn; Andante and Scherzo, Guilmant; Allegretto from Trio, No. 5, Beethoven.

CONGREGATIONAL CHAPEL, MALDON.—An organ recital was given on May 2nd, 1888, by Mr. W. C. Everett (of Colchester), also solos by Miss A. Bass, and anthems by the choir, were sung, Mr. O. D. Belshaw playing the accompaniments. The programme included: Overture, "Occasional." (Handel); Larghetto, from clarionet quintet (Mozart); Symphony, No. 5, "Allegro Vivace" (Widor); grand solemn march (Smart); Allegro moderato, in A (Hopkins); and Symphony No. 5, "Toccata" (Widor).

ASHBY-DE-LA-ZOUCH.—An organ recital was given in Holy Trinity Church, on April 18th, by M. Eugène Gigout, organist of S. Augustine's, Paris. The programme was as follows: Sonata in F (Mendelssohn); Andante and Allegretto, con. moto (Gigout); Piece in B Minor (Schumann); Toccata (Dubois); March Funèbre, grand chorus dialogue (Gigout); improvisation on a given theme, fugue in G Minor (J. S. Bach). M. Gigout's very fine playing was greatly appreciated by the large congregation present.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.—The large new organ built by Messrs. Bevington and Sons, for the Kaumakapili Church, Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, and played on in London before the Queen of the Sandwich Islands by Dr. H. Walmsley Little, F.C.O., was opened on April 7th, with a recital by Mr. Wray Taylor, organist of St. Andrew's Cathedral, who presented the following programme:—"Hawaii Ponoi." Kaumakapili March in F, Wray Taylor; Berceuse in A, Delbruck; Evening Prayer, Smart; Fantasia in C major, Tours; Carillons de Dunkerque (1780), Carter-Turpin; Prelude and Fugue in C, Bach; Fantasia Pastorale, Wély; Andante in C, Silas; Flute Concerto, Rink; War March from "Athalie," Mendelssohn. "God Save the Queen." "Star-Spangled Banner." "Hawaii Ponoi." The English and American National Anthems were played at the conclusion of the recital in honour of the war vessels in port. The Honolulu Pacific Commercial Advertiser of April 9th gives a most favourable account of the instrument and performance.

WARE PARISH CHURCH.—An organ recital, with vocal solos, was given on May 8th, by Mr. G. H. Gregory, Mus. Bac. Oxon., F.C.O., and Mr. J. L. Gregory, F.C.O. Programme:—Occasional overture (Handel), Mr. G. H. Gregory; Andante con moto in E, Fugue in A minor (posthumous works), (Chipp), Mr. J. L. Gregory; Allegro finale "Jubilee" (Hopkins), Mr. G. H. Gregory; Andante in G (Smart), Mr. J. L. Gregory; Prelude in D and Fugue on "Angels' Hymn" (G. H. Gregory), Mr. G. H. Gregory; Finale, Op. 52 (Schumann), Mr. J. L. Gregory.

MANCHESTER.—At St. Philip's Church, Bradford-road, a musical service was held on April 8th. Mr. T. Hall, A.C.O. (organist Albert Memorial Church, Manchester), presided at the organ:—Offertoire No. 4, Lefebure-Wély; Adoremus (melodie religieuse), Henri Ravina; Toccata, Theoel Dubois; Nazareth, Charles Gounod; Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, J. S. Bach; Andante con moto, Alex Guilmant; Grand chœur (alla Handel), Alex Guilmant.

S. PETER'S COLLEGIATE CHURCH, WOLVERHAMPTON.—Programme of organ recital, given on May 7th, by Dr. Taylor, F.C.O., of Stafford. Grand Offertoire in F (Batiste); Andante (Mailly); Marche, "Pontificale," Lemmens; Barcarolle (Benneú); Toccata and Fugue, D Minor (Bach); Pastorale in G (Merkel); Postlude (Wely).

CLAPTON PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF ENGLAND, DOWNS PARK ROAD, HACKNEY DOWNS.—A recital was given on the new three manual organ (built by Mr. Henry Speechly) on May 8th, by Mr. H. W. Weston, F.C.O., organist and choirmaster of the Parish Church, Balham, S.W. Vocalist Mr. Malcolm Harding. The programme included: Concerto in D minor (No. 10), Handel; Adagio from the 3rd Symphony, Mendelssohn; Overture for Organ in D major, Morandi; Intermezzo and Fugue upon a church theme (from Pastoral Sonata, op. 88), Rheinberger; Andante and Variations, Lemmens; Tempo di Minuetto (MSS.), H. W. Weston; Canon in B minor (op. 56, No. 5), Schumann; Grand Solemn March in E flat, H Smart.

LOUDWATER.—On May 1st a recital was given in the Parish Church by Mr. J. G. Wrigley, F.C.O., Mus. Bac., Oxon. Notes.

A request from the Oratorio Festival Committee of Peterborough having been received by the Dean and Chapter of Lincoln Cathedral to the effect that Lincoln should co-operate with Peterborough in the performance of triennial festivals, a meeting was recently held at the Deanery, Lincoln, to consider the question. The Dean explained that a proposal had been made to the authorities of the Cathedral by the Dean of Peterborough and others to the effect that some kind of united choir festival should be attempted on the same principles, though not on the same scale, as those which succeeded so well at Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester. He said that two oratorios had been given in Peterborough, both well attended, and the first a financial success, and he pointed out that Lincoln Cathedral is admirably adapted for the purpose of an oratorio, adding that with proper arrangement adapted to produce order and reverence, grand religious music is best heard in religious buildings. The Dean and Chapter, he said, were willing that the Cathedral choir should take part in the Festival Services. The Sub-Dean said that when at Gloucester he was much averse to services of such a description being held in the Cathedral, but experience had shown that great good was done, and the study of music encouraged by the rendering of sacred oratorios in our cathedrals. He moved that a committee be formed to co-operate with the Peterborough Committee in carrying out the arrangements for their third triennial festival, in 1888. The resolution having been seconded by the Mayor, was carried unanimously. The Rev. G. T. Harvey proposed, and the Rev. Canon Hutton seconded, a motion that the committee consider the possibility of carrying out a similar festival in Lincoln Cathedral, in 1889, in conjunction with the Peterborough Committee. This was also carried. It was further decided to request the Peterborough Committee to state in what way the Lincoln Committee could help forward by their assistance the oratorios to be held in the current year, and also to state as soon as possible the day appointed.

Recently, in the course of a lecture on Church Music, given at the Hall of the International College in the Finchley Road, by Mr. Hemming, whose name will be remembered by the members of Mr. Henry Leslie's choir, attention was called to the comparative rarity of genuine congregational singing in our English churches. Mr. Hemming cited a single church where the Psalms are to be heard literally chanted by the people; but it is, as he said, a rare exception to hear them thus rendered, and the fact goes far to explain the charges of deadness which are so frequently brought against our Anglican worship. "All that is required," says Church Bells, "to remedy the evil is a little energy and tact, combined with average musical capacity on the part of one of the clergy connected with every church, and in a day like this, when musical education is so general, it ought not to be difficult to meet this requirement." But, as has been shown in these columns, people have just realised a sufficient sense of the beauty and delicacy of music to know that in sacred art, as in other things, it is possible for ignorant and indiscreet persons to "rush in where angels fear to tread." In truth, our national musical education has sapped and probably destroyed congregational singing as formerly known, without so far gaining strength enough to give us a higher, more correct, and efficient form of congregational music.

In "Our Work," devoted to the doings of charitable organisations, there is a touching account of the "Cooper's Court Night Refuge," the Secretary's address of which is 27, Kilburn Park Road, N.W. One of the unfortunate inmates is described as "an organist who had held a post in one of our cathedrals." It would be satisfactory to know where this unhappy wanderer and occupant of a bed in a Night Refuge, for probably only a night or two, has drifted in that world of London in which "wrecked lives are much more plentiful than happy fortunes." Surely such a case ought to stir up the energies of all organists and lovers of organ music in the interests of the "Organists' Benevolent Society."

Following the reading of a paper before the Birmingham and Midland Musical Guild, Mr. Casson, of Denbigh, and Mr. John Heywood, organist of St. Paul's Church, Balsall Heath, have requested the attendance of friends and experts on the 21st inst., at three o'clock, at St. Paul's Church, Balsall Heath, on which occasion Mr. Casson will give a practical illustration of his New Organ Building Reform, on the newly-constructed organ after his system.

At a recent monthly meeting of the Musical Association, a paper entitled "Points of interest connected with the English school of the sixteenth century" was read by Mr. J. H. Mee. The lecturer claimed for our music of this period a higher position than is commonly assigned to it. He endeavoured to show that up to that time we even possessed theorists and composers of sacred and secular music in advance of those to be found on the Continent. He also supplied evidence as to the opinion foreigners entertained of our early English music. Mr. Mee advanced an ingenious theory in explanation of the vocal excellence of early English writing, basing his views upon the more perfect consonance of chords in one position than in another, as demonstrated by Helmholtz. Mr. C. E. Stephen, T. L. Southgate, and S. F. Maitland took part in the discussion.

The death of M. Jean Romary Grosjean, a French cathedral organist, composer, and writer on the instrument of high reputation, is announced from Saint-Dié.

An organ with four manuals and pedal will be placed in the Irish Exhibition, Olympia, Kensington. The instrument, built by Mr. H. Wedlake, 8 Berkeley Road, Regent's Park, according to report, will be an interesting specimen of tubular pneumatic action, and will display sundry improvements.

Mr. Edgar Pettman, F.C.O., has been appointed organist of St. Mary's, Kilburn, holding the new position in conjunction with his present appointment.

Though it seemed to be agreed that the glory of the once famous Sistine Chapel Choir in Rome is one of the things of the past, church musicians will be interested in the approaching tour to Paris, and it is warmly hoped, London also, for the purpose of lending their aid to a work of charity. They are to sing in one of the fashionable Parisian churches, and will perform works by Palestrina, Marcello, Leo, and Durante, besides the celebrated "Miserere" of Allegri.

Now people are interested in revivals of old organ music, it might be well to unearth "6 Sonate per Organo e Cembalo" (1741), composed by Martini and published in Bologna, and not without esteem in their day. Such music would have a special interest, now the pianoforte is employed occasionally with organ.

The regretted death, after a brief illness, of Mr. H. Littleton (Novello and Co.) removes a familiar figure of the musical world. Organists and church musicians will not forget the distinguished services the late eminent publisher rendered to their, as well as to other, departments of the art, by his excellent, and withal very cheap, issue of musical classics.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS' CALENDAR.

On Tuesday next, the library will be opened from 7 to 8. At 8, at the Bloomsbury Hall, Hart Street, Mr. E. H. Turpin will offer some remarks on "Elementary Orchestration." Members, students, and friends are invited to bring with them copies of Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonatas, passages from which will be quoted as furnishing suggestions for typical and varied instrumentation. June 26th, Lecture by Dr. C. W. Pearce; July 17th, 18th, 19th, F.C.O. Examination; July 20th, Diploma Distribution; July 24th, 25th, 26th, A.C.O. Examination; July 27th, Diploma Distribution. Other arrangements and particulars will be duly announced.

ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS.

You are kindly requested to write for Ainsworth's "New Patent Organ Pedal Combination List." Ainsworth's "New Patent" is perfectly unique and may be combined easily with any Piano. It is the only one which may be safely combined with any Piano without deteriorating the instrument. Having put down at my works two engines and machinery of the most desirable kind, I am now supplying my goods at a price which enables every organist and organ student to have always ready for use in his Studio an

ORGAN PEDAL PIANO,

Affording Perfectly Unique Pedal Practice.

34, Sheen Park, Richmond.

Dear Sir,—I have deferred writing to comment upon your Pedals and Action now attached to my pianoforte until I could satisfy myself of their utility and efficiency. I can now conscientiously say that they more than fulfil all my anticipations. Although I am no carpenter, aided by your lucid diagram I had little difficulty in attaching them myself, and it is impossible to over-estimate the comfort they give to me or to conceive the saving of time one experiences in one's own room.—Believe me, yours truly,

BURNHAM HORNER, F.R. Hist.S.

To Mr. Mr. Ainsworth.

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to bear testimony to the perfection of your Invention. I am more than satisfied with your Patent Action and Organ Pedals, and consider them worth double the money. Organists and organ students who desire to improve in the Art of Pedalling, which is so essential to a good organist, will do well to procure a set. I have seen no Action half so effective, and one can sit at the Piano and play, "Fixed in his everlasting seat," or any other organ music, or organ arrangement with the greatest pleasure. The touch of pedals could not be better, and the action is as you say, "Absolutely free from annoyances." They cannot be too highly recommended, as by their use, rapid progress is certain.—Believe me, sincerely yours,

I. B. Thornton,
Organist, Birstall, Leeds.

Cologne, July 16th, 1886.

My Dear Sir,—I have much pleasure in informing you that your Pedals have given the fullest satisfaction. I have them combined with my practice Piano. Many of my musical friends who have seen them, as well as my organ pupils, are quite delighted with them; and I must acknowledge that I have never met with any Pedals so noiseless and pleasant to play upon as yours. The Action I consider durable, and of very good workmanship. Every organist who desires to perfect his playing will welcome your invention. I can recommend your goods in every respect.—Yours truly,

Herr J. RODENKIRCHEN.

To John Ainsworth, Esq. Organist, The Cathedral, Cologne, Germany.

TOOLS.—In order to facilite the attachment, a complete set of tools are sent (four in number) each one marked for its particular use. By the use of these tools, and following carefully the directions, ANY ONE can make a really good attachment.

The Musical World.

LONDON: SATURDAY, MAY 19, 1888.

MR. HENRY LITTLETON.

Universal regret will be felt throughout the musical profession, and among many outside it, at the news of the sudden death of Mr. Henry Littleton—for so many years the leading spirit of the publishing firm of Novello, Ewer, and Co.—which took place on Friday morning last week, at his residence, Westwood House, Sydenham, after a short illness, the serious nature of which was not at first realised. The record of Mr. Littleton's life is one of conspicuous service in the branch of business to which he devoted his energies, and which he may be said in certain respects to have revolutionised, not the least important of these being the issue of vocal scores of classical masterpieces, at prices transcending in point of cheapness the most sanguine dreams of musical amateurs who lived in the days of guinea oratorios—the lowest price at which works of the kind were then obtainable. The entry of Mr. Henry Littleton into the service of Mr. Alfred Novello in 1841, when the latter gentleman took over the music publishing business of his father, Vincent Novello, was an event fraught with important results for the firm in which he was destined to rise from a subordinate post to that of partner, and subsequently, sole representative. It was at about that time that Vincent Novello's arrangement of the vocal score of the "Messiah" was issued in a dozen monthly numbers at sixpence each, bringing the complete work down to the then surprising price of six shillings. But Mr. Henry Littleton was not content to stop there; he saw, and was quick to seize, an opportunity for working still further wonders in the trade that presently offered itself in the economical system of music printing known as typography—a means of replacing the more costly process of plate engraving, which still further extended the business and increased the fortunes of the firm, while exercising a beneficial influence over musical art in England, the importance of which it would be difficult to over-estimate. It may be said, without exaggeration, that but for this, oratorios, anthems, operas, cantatas, glees, and part songs, thus speedily multiplied and placed within the reach of the slenderest purses, none but a very small percentage of the innumerable choral societies, and other similar bodies, whose doings in all parts of the country are recorded from time to time in these columns, would have ever seen the light. When in 1866 Mr. Alfred Novello seceded from the business, to pass the remainder of his days in well-earned retirement at Nice, Mr. Henry Littleton became sole proprietor of the now colossal firm, and a year after, by the purchase of copyrights from Ewer and Co., he secured "Elijah" and other music of Mendelssohn, in addition to the copyright of "St. Paul," which had long since been in his hands. Amateurs will not need to be reminded of the "Oratorio Concerts" established some years ago at Exeter and St. James's Halls, in which Mr. Littleton was largely interested, and which were latterly revived under Dr. Mackenzie's direction at St. James's Hall, or of the series of daily concerts started by the same energetic spirit in the early days of the Albert Hall. Last year Mr. Henry Littleton resigned in favour of his son, Mr. Alfred Littleton, the active management of the firm; a firm which has extended it ramifications to New York, and has now in London two publishing houses besides other establishments devoted to printing and bookbinding. It will be remembered that Mr. Littleton's retirement after fifty years of honourable and useful work in the music trade, was made the occasion of a "Jubilee" and of a testimonial, presented by his numerous employés. It remains only to be said that, though not himself a musician, Mr. Henry Littleton was ever ready to prove, in his acts, his sense of indebtedness to the musical art through which he had gained so much, and for that art's sake he has in many cases been known to purchase and publish scores of Oratorios, Cantatas, and other works by modern composers of merit, though well aware, while doing so, of the slight probability of their proving immediately profitable.

The funeral of Mr. Littleton took place on Wednesday. The procession left Westwood House, Sydenham, the residence of the deceased, shortly before half-past two, and proceeded to St. Bartholomew's Church, where the first part of the service was celebrated. The officiating clergy, the Rev. Henry White, Rev. Dr. Troutbeck, and the Rev. Canon Yeatman, the vicar, and the choir (comprising members of Westminster Abbey, St. Paul's Cathedral, and the Chapel Royal, who had volunteered their services) with the boys of Westminster Abbey Choir, met the coffin at the porch and proceeded up the church, singing the Sentences to the music of Croft and Purcell. The anthem was "If we believe that Jesus died," by Sir John Goss. The service in the church concluded with the hymn "Jesus lives, no longer now," set to special music. Dr. G. C. Martin and Dr. W. J. Westbrook, organist of the church, presided at the organ, and Dr. J. F. Bridge also took part in the service. On leaving the church, the cortège, which was joined by a number of private carriages, proceeded to the cemetery at Lee, where the interment took place. The sentences were sung by a portion of the choir, and the Rev. Dr. Troutbeck officiated at the grave. Amongst those present were representatives of the Royal Academy of Music, College of Organists, Trinity College, Choir Benevolent Fund, Messrs. Joseph Barnby, Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, H. C. Lunn, Henry Gadsby, H. Lahee, Joseph Bennett, Berthold Tours, Lewis Thomas, W. H. Thomas, J. Peck, Sir Geo. Grove, W. H. Cummings, Ambrose Austin, Miss Macirone, and a large gathering of the staff employed at the various branches of the firm.

Correspondence.

ANALYTICAL PROGRAMMES.

To the Editor of The Musical World.

Sir,—I am glad to see that attention is being drawn in your columns to the "Book Nuisance"—one is almost justified in calling it the "Book Swindle"—in concert rooms, and cordially agree with your correspondent "Annuitant," that the time has come when a determined stand should be made against it. But my experience of grievances of this kind not long since proved to me that all the letter-writing and all the protests in the world will be unavailing to bring offenders to their senses, unless some united action be taken by the victims themselves. Let a goodly number of habitual concert-goers, then, enter into a solemn league and covenant to resolutely refrain from buying the proffered book (whether they want it or not) at all entertainments where small programmes are not also distributed. The pile of "returns" that would be left on hand in such a case may be trusted to speedily deal a death-blow to this system. An opera season, too, has just commenced. Of course it would be unreasonable to expect librettos for nothing (although eighteenpence has always seemed to me an unconscionable price for one), but here also let the rule with frequenters be never to encourage the sale of these whenever a smaller list of singers is not forthcoming.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

E. N.

To the Editor of The Musical World.

Sir,—The subject to which your correspondent, "Annuitant," refers in your last issue is, I think, one upon which the thoughts of those who frequent classical concerts might do good, if put on paper and brought before the readers of The Musical World, and thence to the powers that be who are responsible for the state of affairs in question.

No one can gainsay the interest and utility of a well-written analytical programme. Alike helpful to possessors and non-possessors of the musical scores, they are also of lasting value to students of form, orchestration, &c. But when one shilling is charged for such a poverty-stricken analysis as that offered at the Bach Choir's concert on Saturday last, and when nothing in the way of a programme can be obtained under the cost of many of the masterpiece vocal scores, it is high time that something should be urged on behalf of those whose pockets are not lined with golden guineas.

In conclusion, may I ask if the surplus analytical programmes of the Crystal Palace, Philharmonic, Richter, London Symphony, &c., concerts can be procured afterwards at reduced cost?—I am, Sir, yours obediently, Country Organist.

ST. ANDREWS UNIVERSITY AND MUSICAL DEGREES.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

Edinburgh, May 14th, 1888.

Sir,—The ponderous playfulness of "Sanders Sanderson, Doctor o' Diveenity, Airts, an' Maidcin, St. Andrews, Fife, N.B.," is quite in keeping with the colossal designation of its author, or, to be a trifle personal, just what might have been expected from one so "broad in the beam" as is that reverend gentleman. Nobody knows him better than I do; but he should really "behave himsel' before folk." He twits me with "crawing crouse" over some examinations. Allow me to tell him that it would be much to the credit of those whom his Senate has laureated, were they in the position to do likewise. "High life below stairs" is, however, far more congenial to these gentry; they have found the level of their musicianship in a degree granted by a university which is destitute both of a faculty and a Professor of Music. The pitiable meanness which accepts such counterfeit distinction is exactly balanced by the preposterous presumption which confers it. Honour there is none on either side. Would that the spirit of "the true, the beautiful, and the good," might attune the music of the spheres to "Veni, vidi, vici"!—I am, Sir, your greatly obliged correspondent,

John Greig,

Queen's College, Oxford.

Concerts.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The Italian operatic season at Covent Garden opened on Monday in auspicious circumstances, and if the state of the house on the first night may be accepted as a criterion, Mr. Harris's enterprise promises to be more successful than the most sanguine admirers of a somewhat antiquated form of art could reasonably have expected. For not only were most of the stalls and boxes—many of them, it is understood, engaged for the whole season—filled by a fashionable audience, including the Prince and Princess of Wales, which recalled to the mind the "palmy days" of Italian opera, but the cheaper seats were well patronised, and the occupants of the gallery were not chary of their applause. There is upon the whole much to be pleased with in these facts. While London is apparently unable to support English opera in anything like a permanent form, and while any thought of the Wagnerian music drama is precluded by the disaster of former years, it is at least satisfactory to note that some taste for serious dramatic music still exists among us, although that music may not be of the very highest class. Whether it will be possible to keep alive this interest even for a short season by the performance of familiar, not to say hackneyed, operas, to the exclusion of any kind of novelty, remains to be seen. Instead of Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor," previously announced, the same master's "Lucrezia Borgia" had been selected for the opening performance. This would have been a distinction with very little difference, but for the fact that the first night of the season did, in consequence of the change, not coincide with the début of Madame Melba, the Australian prima donna, whose appearance had been looked forward to with considerable interest. The cast of "Lucrezia" included only well known artists, although Madame Fürsch-Madi, the representative of the heroine, had not been heard for some time on the London stage. That lady forcibly illustrates the type of the dramatic soprano properly so-called. According to Gregorovius and other modern historians, Lucrezia Borgia was a soft-spoken, most insinuating lady, very proud of her beautiful fair hair, which she used to bleach in the sun for hours together. She was by no means cruel by nature, and became quite respectable at Ferrara, when once removed from the evil influences of her father's Court. But of this historic type Madame Fürsch-Madi has retained little or nothing beyond the fair hair, and, indeed, she could not be expected to have done so. The Lucrezia she had to embody has passed through the alembic of the playwright and the librettist's mind, and has come forth a monster in human form. Having to realise such a type, the artist had scarcely any choice but to do it in Victor Hugo's vein, and for that purpose she is eminently fitted by nature. Her voice is strong rather than sympathetic, and her action extremely powerful. Both her wrath and her maternal affection were depicted with a profusion of gesture, and even the air "Com' é bello" received a heroic tinge from her treatment of the graceful embellishments with which it is studded. It is sufficient to add that in its own way Madame Fürsch-Madi's performance was an artistic one, and well worthy of the applause awarded to it. Signor Ravelli, a sweet-voiced Gennaro, and Signor Navarrini, as the Duke, also were satisfactory, but the chief vocal effect of the evening was made by Madame Trebelli (Maffio Orsini) in the famous "Il segreto," which was given with all the spirit and brilliancy of the artist's earlier days. Of the chorus it would be premature to judge from this sample music, but the voices seemed fresher than usual, and some attempts at acting were occasionally noticeable, owing, no doubt, to the arduous efforts at imparting life to the performance which Mr. Harris had evidently made. The excellent orchestra, under its excellent conductor, Signor Mancinelli, was more than equal to its task.—Times.

On Tuesday night, a very fine performance of "Carmen" was given, the mis-en-scène and stage management being as excellent as the musical ensemble, a fact on which Mr. Harris and Signor Mancinelli must be congratulated conjointly and severally. Madame Nordica, who essayed the part of Bizet's gipsy for the first time, won the favour of the audience by her charming stage presence, and by a musical execution which left nothing to be desired as regards beauty of voice and correctness of intonation. Her acting wanted a little of that devilry which has made the part of Carmen what it is; but this also was a fault on the right side, there being no suspicion of that exaggeration and excessive dash which some artists have imparted to the character. Signor de Reims, the new tenor, evidently suffered from nervousness, and, in consequence, forced his voice; but Miss MacIntyre, another débutante, scored a great success as Michaela. Her voice is fresh and beautiful, and her acting showed considerable intelligence and dramatic power. Of this young prima donna we shall have to say more anon. We may add that Signor Del Puente, as the Torreador, was as excellent as ever.

For Thursday, "La Traviata," with Mdlle. Ella Russell in the title part, was announced.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

A novelty of great interest was presented at these concerts on Monday last in the closing scene from the "Götterdämmerung." This scene, as those who have witnessed the opera will remember, is immediately preceded by the death of the hero Siegfried, and presents the spectacle of the burning of his body on a funeral pyre upon which Brünnhilde, leaping wildly on to her horse Grane, springs with a single bound. Although much of the effect was unadvoidably lost by the absence of the scenic accessories, which, as always with Wagner, and especially in this scene, play so important a part, the music is so intensely dramatic and descriptive, that the excerpt produced a great impression, to which the fine declamatory singing of Miss Pauline Cramer largely contributed. The remainder of the first part of the programme consisted of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, the "Prelude and Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde," and the "Walkürewith," all magnificently played under Herr Richter's masterly direction. The concert concluded with a fine performance of Stanford's "Irish" symphony, a work now familiar to Continental and American as well as English audiences. The symphony will always be heard with pleasure; for the composer is here represented in his most felicitous vein, and the masterly instrumentation and technical skill displayed throughout, as well as the ingenious use of the two Irish folk-songs worked in by Mr. Stanford produced their full effect on Monday. Mr. Stanford was warmly applauded on making his appearance at the close of his work.

PIANOFORTE RECITAL BY MR. RIDLEY PRENTICE.

Foremost among the praiseworthy features of the Guildhall School of Music is the institution of weekly recitals given by Professors to the students. Last Monday week Mr. Ridley Prentice was the performer, and he showed at once his own progressive tendencies, and his trust in the earnest purpose of the students, by including in his programme the great Sonata in F minor, op. 5, by Brahms. The result proved that this trust was in nowise misplaced. The room was crowded, and each of the five movements of this lengthy and beautiful sonata was listened to with deep attention, and evidently thoroughly appreciated; specially the long-drawn sweetness of the slow movement, and the fiery dash of the scherzo. Even in this early work the breadth and vigour of the various themes are strongly suggestive of the orchestra; and we cannot wonder that Brahms's compositions for pianoforte alone have since then been comparatively infrequent. The rest of Mr. Ridley Prentice's programme was wisely made up of lighter works, comprising his own "Elegy" and "Gavotte Fantastique"; Schubert's "Momens Musicals," and pieces by Chopin. A specially fine pianoforte by Messrs. Broadwood proved itself fully equal to the exacting demands made upon it in the Brahms Sonata.

MR. CHAS. HALLE'S CONCERTS.

Mr. Hallé gave the first of his series of chamber music concerts on Friday week, before a large and appreciative audience, assisted by Madame Norman Neruda and Herren Ries, Straus, and Franz Neruda. Mr. Hallé intends playing successively the eight last sonatos of Beethoven, and, on Friday, commenced with that gem in F sharp, op. 78. It is surprising that this sonato is not more widely known amongst amateurs, for it is full of charm of sentiment and expression, and its technical difficulties are not insurmountable to a fairly accomplished pianist. Mr. Hallé's execution of it displayed his refined method and delicate technique to peculiar advantage. The programme included Dvoràk's quintet in A, for piano and strings (first time); Bach's E major sonata, for piano and violin; and Brahms's fine quintet, in F minor. Mr. Hallé has provided a very attractive bill of fare for his forthcoming concerts.

THE BACH CHOIR.

An excellent and numerously-attended performance of Bach's great Mass in B minor was given by the Bach Choir on Saturday afternoon, this being the ninth rendering of the monumental work by the choral society, which, it will be remembered, was originally started for the purpose of interpreting Bach's works, and this Mass in particular. Mr. C. V. Stanford conducted, and the choral singing under his able leadership was all that could be desired. The soli were fairly well represented by Miss Anna Williams, Miss Damian, Mr. Watkin Mills, and Mr. Ben Davies. The three artists first-named are well versed in sacred music, but Mr. Ben Davies, whose name has of recent years been principally connected with comic opera, surprised the audience by the artistic earnestness with which he entered into Bach's spirit.

MR. BERINGER'S RECITAL.

The pressure on our space compels us to treat with great brevity the very interesting recital given by Mr. Oscar Beringer, on Tuesday afternoon. Mr. Beringer played with technical perfection and high musical intelligence Liszt's "Rhapsodie Elegique," and Schumann's sonata in G minor, and selections from Schubert, Mackenzie, and other composers; and, in conjunction with his gifted pupil, Luigi Arditi, the arrangement for two pianos of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso." As a bonne bouche for musicians with an antiquarian turn of mind, he provided a "posthumous" trio for pianoforte and strings, by Beethoven, not in itself a very important work, but none the less interesting as an historic curiosity. It was admirably played by Mr. Beringer, Mr. Ludwig, and Mr. Howell. Mdlle. Trebelli contributed some vocal pieces.

THE CONSTANTINE CONCERT.

The concert given in aid of the fund now being raised for the benefit of this veteran teacher took place on May 11 at Princes' Hall. The audience was not as large as might have been hoped for, considering the object and the strong force of artists generously assisting. These included Madame Rose Hersee, Madame Patey, Miss Kate Fuselle, Messrs. Reginald Groome, Lucas Williams, Grossmith, Beerbohm-Tree, &c. All exerted themselves with admirable effect. It may be well to add, contributions to the fund may still be forwarded to the Hon. Sec., E. Rogers, Esq., Crichton Club, Savoy.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Mdlle. Ida Henry attracted a representative audience to the Princes' Hall on the occasion of her annual evening concert on Wednesday, May 9th. The vocalist was Miss Carlotta Elliott, and there was a strong string quartette, made up by Herren Ludwig Straus and Karl Henkel, Messrs. J. Channell and I. E. Hambleton, these gentlemen performing Bach's Concerto in D major for pianoforte and quartette accompaniment; Mdlle. Ida Henry exhibiting considerable technical ability in the pianoforte part. The solos selected by the pianiste included Mendelssohn's Fantasia, op. 28, Liszt's "Chant Polonais," No. 1, Impromptu No. 2, in F sharp, two Studies and a Tarantelle by Schubert.

Although a little disappointed by the non-appearance of Mr. Santley, who, as our readers will know, is still suffering from the effects of his recent severe illness, the large and fashionable audience which assembled in the Steinway Hall, on Friday of last week were most enthusiastic throughout Miss Cowen's Dramatic Recital. The greatest success was secured in the clever recitation of a new sketch by Mr. Re Henry, entitled, "Little Mrs. Somebody, the Tenor's Wife." A new comedietta by Mr. Eric Lewis, entitled, "Next Door," given also for the first time, in which Miss Cowen and the author took part, was very favourably received. Miss Cowen is fast rising into the front rank of her profession, and if we are to take Friday's performance as an earnest, her popularity is already well assured. Miss Damian, who took the place of Mr. Santley, was deservedly encored for her singing of "The Angel Came," by Cowen.

On the 9th May, Miss Kate Flinn and Mdlle. Agnes Janson gave an evening concert of more than usual attractiveness, at the Steinway Hall. These young vocalists were assisted by Mr. William Shakespeare and Herr Waldemar Meyer. The programme ranged over compositions by Rossini, Gluck, Dvorák, Schubert, Massenet, Schumann, Cowen, Caracciolo, Maude White, and Franz Ries. The feature of the performance was, naturally, duets, which were given with considerable artistic effect.

Musical amateurs owe Mr. Edwin Bending their best thanks for the attempt which he is making to break through the tradition of unpopularity which surrounds the Albert Hall. There is a large class of the public who love the commonplace in musical art. It is with a thoughtful remembrance of these that the promoter of this present series of admirable Saturday afternoon musical diversions frames his programmes. If the locale could be changed for a more accessible quarter, there is little doubt that Mr. Bending's praiseworthy enterprise would be crowned with success. As it was, the numerous other attractions on Saturday last had its natural effect on the attendance at the Albert Hall. The American duo, Mr. and Mdme. Lawton, were again in request, but the chief honours of the performance were shared by Miss Hope Glenn, whose reception was most enthusiastic, and by Herr Poznanski, a violinist of considerable brilliancy.

On the 3rd instant the members of the Wandsworth Common Choral Society gave a performance of Cowen's "Rose Maiden," in St. Andrew's Hall, Balham. The soli were sung by Madame Florence Ashworth, Miss Jessie King, Mr. Ager Grover, and Mr. G. W. Kenway. The instrumental accompaniments were arranged for two pianos and a powerful harmonium by Mr. John H. E. Ashworth, who took the first piano, with Miss M. Smith at the second, and Mr. B. Vine Westbrook at the harmonium. Mr. T. Magee conducted. It should be mentioned that Mr. B. Vine Westbrook, who is a Fellow of the College of Organists, took his difficult and elaborate part at sight (having been called upon in an emergency caused by illness) with ease and brilliancy.

Miss Margaret Hoare gave a most attractive concert at the Steinway Hall, on Monday evening. This lady's sympathetic voice and artistic method fully deserved the applause she obtained. A word of praise is due to Miss Kate and Miss Nellie Chaplin for their excellent rendering of two movements from Grieg's C minor Sonata. Miss Kate Chaplin plays with a fire and breadth of style rather unusual in a violinist of her sex. Her assistance was valuable in supplying the violin obbligato to several of the songs; while her sister joined with Mr. E. J. Margetson in duets for two pianofortes with brilliancy and spirit. When we mention the names of such artists as Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. William Shakespeare, Mr. Bridson, and Mr. Ivor McKay, as assisting Miss Hoare in carrying out her programme, it is not surprising that the concert proved such a complete success.

Mrs. M. A. Carlisle gave a grand afternoon concert at the Princes' Hall, on Thursday, May 10th, with the assistance of Miss Bertha Moore, Miss Sybil Carlisle (her first appearance), Mr. Luther Munday, Mr. Alfred Jordan, Mr. Herbert Thorndyke, Mr. Richard Green, Mr. Perry, Mr. Alfred H. West (pianist), and Mr. Guillaume Frank (violinist). Mrs. Carlisle was heard to great advantage in Blumenthal's "Sunshine and Rain," and Mr. A. H. West's "Cabala," and in the duets with Miss Sybil Carlisle, "It was a Lover and his Lass," by Mary Carmichael, and "My boat is waiting here for thee," by Smart. Mr. George Giddens gave a most humorous rendering of Mark Twain's "Nightmare" between the parts. The conductors were Mr. Wilhelm Ganz, Signor Carlo Ducci, and Mr. Wilfred Bendall.

Miss Holland's choir gave a performance in aid of charity at the Portman Rooms, on Monday, May 10th. The programme consisted of Mr. Gant's Cantata, "Joan of Arc," preceded by Jensen's graceful "Feast of Adonis." The principal solos in the cantata were divided between Miss Emily Lawson and Mr. Luther Munday. Miss Lawson, who is still advancing in public appreciation, sang the part of Joan with her usual charm of voice and refinement of manner, joined to considerable dramatic emphasis. The choir acquitted themselves very creditably under the leadership of Miss Holland.

A concert was given at Steinway Hall, on Tuesday evening last, by Miss Lilian Greville, in the presence of a numerous audience. The concert-giver possesses a contralto voice of considerable range, and was much applauded in a varied selection of songs. She was assisted by Miss Constance Lardelli, Miss Nellie Levey, Mr. Henry Phillips, Mr. Templer Saxe, who possesses a fine baritone voice, and MM. Henri Logé and Kevé Ortmans. During the interval between the parts Mr. Arthur Wellesley contributed an effective recitation from the pen of Mr. G. R. Sims, entitled, "The Man Hunt." The accompaniments were well played by M. Logé and Signor Carlo Ducci, and Miss Greville may be congratulated upon a very successful concert.

[We are compelled to hold over notices of Mr. Theo. Werner's concert on Tuesday, Grieg's Recital, on Wednesday; the Philharmonic, on Thursday; and several minor concerts.]

PROVINCIAL.

BIRMINGHAM, May 14.—Our Musical Festival is approaching, and in the interest of our readers, I am now able to give a full outline of the festival programme. Dr. Hans Richter has been with us last week, and the sub-committee have concluded their musical arrangements, of which the following is an outline. Tuesday morning, "Elijah" (Mendelssohn). Tuesday evening, "Stabat Mater" (Dvořák); Symphony in D, No. 6 of the Solomon set (Haydn); Rhapsodie for orchestra (Liszt); Overture to "Oberon" (Weber); Vocal solo (Madame Albani); Vocal solo (Mr. Brereton). Wednesday morning, "Judith and Holofernes" (Dr. Hubert Parry); "Golden Legend" (Sir A. Sullivan). Wednesday evening, "Cottar's Saturday Night" (Mackenzie). Vorspiel (Meistersinger)—Wagner; Pianoforte concerto, in A minor (Schumann), to be played by Miss Fanny Davies, vocal solo, Mr. Charles Banks; Autumn song (Grieg); Psalm (Franz); "Jupiter" Symphony (Mozart). Thursday morning, "Messiah" (Handel); Thursday evening, "Callirhoe" (Dr. Bridge); Fantasie (Grieg); Hymn (Weber); Academische overture (Brahms); Vocal solo Mdme. Trebelli; The prize song (Meistersinger), Mr. Lloyd. Friday morning, Magnificat (Bach); Fifth Symphony (Beethoven); "Messe des Morts" (De Berlioz). Friday evening, "Saul" (Handel). The choral rehearsals under the careful and energetic chorus master (Mr. Hockley), are being carried on with plenty of zeal and vigour, and the choruses promise to be the finest yet heard in the Town Hall. The Committee had to fight against disappointments, and their task this time has been difficult beyond measure. In the first instance, Dvořák, the Bohemian composer, resigned his commission, then Mr. Goring Thomas withdrew from the list, and finally Dr. Mackenzie, owing to ill health, had to substitute a short choral work for the oratorio originally proposed by him. Under these circumstances the Festival Committee were compelled to do what they could for the best, and the excellent programme now submitted will be approved by all musicians and lovers of the divine art.—O.P.

Facts and Comments.

Now that the arrangements for the Handel Festival are so far advanced, it might be worth while to inquire whether the management have taken into consideration the bottle nuisance, which has been so marked and unpleasant a feature on former occasions. It is not pleasant for those outside the select circle of reserved seats, to have their enjoyment of "Let the bright seraphim" interrupted by the popping of ginger beer corks and incessant clatter of dinner plates and tea cups. If the present enterprising management of the Crystal Palace wish to make this year's Festival a complete success, it is towards minor and unpleasant details, such as this, as well as to greater affairs, that they should turn their attention. We feel sure, moreover, that they only require to have their notice drawn to this matter for it to be remedied.

The next monthly meeting of the Cremona Society will be held at the rooms of the Royal Society of Musicians, in Lisle Street, Leicester Square, on the evening of Wednesday, May 30th, at 8 o'clock, when a paper on "How to judge a violin," will be read, by Horace W. Petherick, Esq. A number of instruments to illustrate the paper will be exhibited. The chair will be taken by G. Curtis Price, Esq.

Dr. Mackenzie has evidently determined to give early sign that his fertility as a musical composer will not be allowed to suffer detriment by reason of the arduous duties connected with his post at the Royal Academy; for in addition to an opera, an oratorio, and other impending works, we now hear of a cantata he has promised to write for the Jubilee of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society.

At the concert to be given at Princes' Hall on June 9, by Mdme. de Pachmann, that lady, as on a former occasion, will appear in the capacity of composer as well as pianist, the new work promised being a sonata for violin and piano from her pen.

Mr. Ovide Musin, who during his four years' residence in America has well established himself in popular favour there as a violinist, will give an orchestral concert at Princes' Hall, on June 19th.

M. de Pachmann's recital at St. James's Hall will take place on June 23rd.

Among the many impending private concerts, one to be given next Tuesday, at Mr. Reuben Sassoon's residence, will possess an interesting feature in the début that will then be made by Miss Elsa, a young soprano concerning whom report speaks very favourably.

There are others besides lovers of art and of artistic experiments who will have reason to rejoice at the pecuniary success of Professor Herkomer's romantic musical pantomime at Bushey; for the poor of that neighbourhood will be benefited to the extent of £136 by the last representation, and the proceeds of the former, amounting to £200, have been devoted to the sufferers by the German inundation. These interesting entertainments, it is satisfactory to learn, are to be resumed next year, and as the professor is distinctly "a man of ideas," he is not likely to remain content without some further development of his experiment, in what direction it remains to be seen.

Madame Marie Roze's final performance of "Carmen" at Liverpool, last week, brought the total number of her appearances in that character to 360. Had these performances therefore taken place on successive nights, she would have been thus occupied (Sundays excluded) for nearly a year and two months.

Mr. C. Hayden Coffin will give an "At Home," on Sunday afternoon next, at the Galleries of British Artists, Suffolk Street.

The summer club house of the new Lyric Club, St. Ann's, Barnes, will be opened on Monday next, the 28th inst., where the Sunday Smoking Concerts will be held, until their new town club house is finished.

Mr. Lawrence Kellie, the popular young tenor, is bringing out an album of ten of his songs, Messrs. Metzler & Co., being the publishers.

Miss Hope Temple announces her first morning concert at the Prince's, on Tuesday, June 5th, when she will be assisted by Miss Marie Tempest, Miss Agnes Janson, Miss Ehrenberg, Mrs. Mary Davies, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Hayden Coffin, Mr. Lawrence Kellie, and Mr. George Giddens.

A new musical comedy, in two acts, entitled "Prisoners at the Bar," written by Edward Oxenford, and composed by W. W. Meadows, will be produced at Newport (Mon.), on the 28th inst.

The Echo states that Miss MacIntyre, the successful débutante at Covent Garden, has received her artistic education at Dr. Wylde's London Academy of Music, having studied under Manuel Garcia for several years.

The death is announced of Mr. Oluf Svendsen, the distinguished flute player, and for a number of years one of the leading representatives of his art in London. Mr. Svendsen was born in Christiana on April 9th, 1832, and received his first instruction from his father. He was engaged as first flautist of the Christiana Theatre at the early age of 14. In 1853 he entered the Conservatoire of Brussels, and two years later came to London at the invitation of Jullien, the famous conductor. Here he soon made a position for himself, playing in the orchestras of the Crystal Palace, Her Majesty's Theatre, the Philharmonic and Richter Concerts, and being in 1861 appointed first flute in the Queen's private band. He also acted as professor of his instrument at the Royal Academy of Music, and was much appreciated as a solo player.

A correspondent draws our attention to a curiously worded advertisement which appears in the columns of the Morning Post, and is to the following effect:—A lady desires to meet with another woman who will play to her two evenings a week, accompanied by 'cello and violin." One would like to know whether the "lady" is going to play upon the violin or 'cello while the other "woman" performs on the piano, or whether she is only going to listen while yet another "man" or another "woman" draws sweet music from the stringed instrument. We trust that the latter arrangement will be adopted. The "lady" ought to have the "woman" she requires on more moderate terms at that rate.

We hear that Mr. Hayden Coffin has been prohibited by his manager from taking part in any morning concerts. Some such self-protective measure will have to be adopted by other people besides Mr. Leslie, if the flood of semi-private concerts, which sets in at the commencement of every season, continues at its present height.

A monument has been erected at Woodlawn Cemetery, New York, to the memory of Dr. Leopold Damrosch, founder and conductor of the New York Symphony Society, the New York Oratorio Society, the German Opera, at the Metropolitan Opera House, and conductor of the Arion Society. According to the "American Art Journal," the monument was designed by the late Herr F. Helbig, of Berlin, and was executed in pure Carrara marble, by Signor F. Cellai, in Rome. The figure is that of a Sibyl, life size, reclining in a Greek chair. On her left arm rests a branch of laurel, which she is about to fashion into a wreath. Her right hand is stretched over the grave of Damrosch, indicating that death had claimed the victor before the wreath was ready. At the base, on a bronze scroll, entwined with laurel, is the legend: Erected by the Oratorio, Arion, and Symphony Societies, A.D., 1888. The line Damrosch, cut in the granite, appears directly over this.

At the opening ceremony, Mr. Andrew Carnegie, made an oration and a chorus of mixed voices, under the direction of Mr. Walter Damrosch, sang a chorale from Bach's Passion Music, according to St. Matthew.

Failing little Hofmann, Mr. Abbey has been in London for the purpose of engaging little Hegner for an American tour, but, so far, nothing has been settled. Needless to add that Mr. Abbey had other things besides boy pianists to look after, for if ever a man had many irons in the fire, it is the great American impresario.

Talking of impresarios, we call the attention of our readers to the account of Mr. Mapleson's bankruptcy case, printed in another column. That enterprising gentleman triumphantly passed his examination, the liabilities being £40,100, and the available assets nil. Having settled an old debt in this agreeable manner, and looking forward to the testimonial which is being organised for him, Mr. Mapleson will, no doubt, forthwith embark upon a new career of adventure, and already an advertisement appears in the daily papers, speaking in mysterious terms of a forthcoming season of Italian opera and ballet at Her Majesty's Theatre. Is it possible that the Ulysses and Proteus of impresarios should have a finger in this pie also? In the meantime, Mr. Mapleson looks as ruddy and flourishing as ever, and we will warrant ate a better dinner than either his counsel or judge on the eve of his trial.

Mons. Gailhard, one of the directors of the Grand Opera of Paris, not having been able to find a sufficiently attractive Juliet for his revival of Gounod's opera on the Continent, has made overtures to the graceful Madame Nordica. Whether the lady has yielded to his tempting offer we must not for the present say.

The two great Italian publishing firms of Ricordi and Mdme. Lucca have been amalgamated, and will, no doubt, carry on their business in a prosperous and grandiose way, for, with the exception of Sonzogno, also of Milan, they have no rival in Italy, and the theatres of the peninsula will be practically at their disposal.

Messrs. Ricordi, as is generally known, are the publishers of Verdi, and represent Italian operatic music generally, while Mdme. Lucca many years ago purchased the Italian copyrights of all Wagner's operas. It will be interesting to observe the position which the new firm and its official organ in the press, the famous Gazzetta Musicale, will take towards the German reformer.

In view of the curious tendency noticeable in crimes and eccentric actions generally to repeat themselves, it is possible some uneasiness may prevail among chorus-masters, lest their vocation, in addition to its many existing worries, should be exposed in the future to perils similar to that lately reported to have been encountered by a superintendent of the ballet at the Paris Grand Opera. The insertion of a pair of scissors several times into the body of a ballet master by an exasperated coryphée does certainly seem to be a highly objectionable mode of expressing annoyance at his exercise of authority, however severe this may have been. It may be hoped, however, that the humanising influence of the divine art will be sufficient to prevent this custom from spreading among the sister profession, and that chorus masters here may continue to fulfil their arduous duties untroubled by the thought that some day they may have to meet their doom at the point of the scissors.

We have to cry pater peccavi for speaking lightly last week of the musical proceedings at the Danish Exhibition, and especially of Mdme. Albani singing "Home, sweet home." "Atlas," in the World, informs the world that a lady present on the occasion was so moved by the concord of these sweet sounds, that she forthwith called for pen and ink, and wrote a cheque for £1,000 for the Incurables. If "Home, sweet home" has such power to move the mind and the purse, Sir Henry Bishop's silly old tune, which was not even his tune, should form an integral part of every charitable concert. But then, music after all is not merely a vehicle for the conveyance of charity; it ought to think a little of itself, or else it may become incurable by helping the Incurables. By the way, is the story in the World true?

Bach's Passion Music, according to St. Matthew, was recently performed by the Concordia Society, under its conductor, Mons. Widor, this being the first complete rendering of the great work in Paris, with the exception only of a performance which took place under Lamoureux, fourteen years ago. The impression upon the public was a profound one, as well it might be, and the soloists, Mdme. Fuchs, Mdme. Boidin-Puisais, M. Lafarge and M. Auguez, are highly spoken of.

The Russian Opera Company, which is going to make a round of Europe, has commenced proceedings, at Berlin, with Glinka's "Life for the Czar." The singers, unfortunately, are not of the first order, but they have the enormous advantage of being thoroughly imbued with the national spirit of the music.

Hans Richter has gone to conduct the Lower Rhenish Festival at Aix-la-Chapelle. The programme is not very remarkable, but it comprises several selections from Wagner's music dramas and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Prèludes"—all of them novelties at these highly conservative gatherings.

An absurd rumour is going the round of the foreign press, according to which Wagner's Tristan and Isolde, and the Meistersinger are to be produced in Rome, with the active co-operation of—Adelina Patti.

Mr. Charles Thomas Edward Miller, professionally known as "Herbert Cole," a writer and composer of songs, has been adjudged bankrupt. He attributes his insolvency entirely to costs of numerous actions brought by him for infringement of his performing rights, his liabilities consisting wholly of such costs. He is described as of Clapton, and returns his liabilities at £1,075 and assets £30.

BEETHOVENIANA.

One would be apt to imagine that, considering the enormous quantity of books written in reference to Beethoven as a composer and a man, including A. W. Thayer's comprehensive and apparently exhaustive biographical work, every scrap of intelligence bearing on this subject had by this time been brought to light. That this is not the case is, indeed, as surprising, as the collection of no less than forty-six hitherto unpublished compositions, some of them of real artistic worth, which Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, of Leipzig, have recently succeeded in discovering, and forming into a supplementary volume of their complete edition of the master's works.

In the same way, although of far smaller general interest and importance, and containing, moreover, much that is already sufficiently familiar, Dr. Theoder Frimmel's "Neue Beethoveniana" (published by Carl Gerold's Sohn, Vienna) deserves to be accepted as a welcome addition to the already existing Beethoven literature. This very carefully-compiled work is divided into five chapters—"Beethoven as a Pianist," "Letters," "The Years 1816 and 1817," "Beethoven at Mödling" (near Vienna), and "Beethoven's Personal Appearance; his Likeness." In the last-named and most exhaustive section of the book, the author attempts, with the most minute criticism, to ascertain from all existing sources, portraits, busts, and plaster casts, the precise likeness of the man at his different ages. Amongst the casts he considers the one taken in 1812 as the most important. This, as well as the almost identical bust, were executed by the sculptor Klein, by order of Andreas Streicher, the celebrated pianoforte maker, and noble-hearted friend of Friedrich von Schiller, the bust being placed in the "Salle Streicher" at Vienna. On the other hand, Dr. Frimmel is unable to select a single portrait as of superior excellence, or as like the original, for Beethoven, unfortunately, was never painted by a great master, and photography was not invented in his time. There are still some persons living (among whom Capellmeister B. Randhartinger) who saw and knew Beethoven more or less intimately, and who remember how people stood in wonder, and even touched their hats at the approach of the strange figure in the streets of Vienna, completely absorbed by the working of his inner self, and unmindful of the things around him. According to Dr. Frimmel, Beethoven was of middle height, of almost massive build, his head was of unusual size, and seemed still larger by reason of the thick mass of black hair (this description refers to the composer's forty-second year) which surrounded it in the greatest disorder. His forehead was very broad, prominent, and not smooth, but "bumpy," and his eyes—small, brown short-sighted, and sunk under a pair of moderately arched eyebrows—were as active as the man himself. He had a broad nose, mouth, and head, a symmetrically-shaped chin, marked by a curious deep transverse indenture, reaching from the point of the chin to the under lip. He had a dark complexion, with a deep reddish tinge in the face, which was fleshy, strongly pitted with the smallpox (like Joseph Haydn's), and lined with a pair of very short whiskers. A powerful, almost clumsy, reddish pair of hands, provided with short, thick fingers, seemed to correspond with the rest of a somewhat uncouth physique. His dress, alternately new and much neglected, was generally chosen according to the fashion of the day. Judging from a drawing by Lyser, he walked somewhat bent forward, with his hands crossed behind his back, and with his head turned upwards, and covered with a cylinder hat pressed deeply into the neck.

But whether even Dr. Frimmel's very precise and elaborate descriptions will succeed in bringing the master's counterfeit with sufficient accuracy and lifelike evidence before the reader's imagination must be open to doubt, if we remember the words penned by Goethe on the occasion of a visit from Wilhelm Grimm:—"A person we may have seen frequently in various likenesses will not appear strange, and yet surprise us; such is the power of reality, of which art knows nothing"; and, indeed, so seldom is the personal character of our 'heroes of the brain' on a par with their ideal creations, that, as a rule, a closer acquaintance with the man is apt to lead to a sense of disappointment, not excepting the case of lofty-minded and large-hearted Beethoven. In reference to this matter, the famous musical critic and littérateur, Eduard Hanslick, at a lecture recently given at Vienna, demonstrated from documentary evidence the injustice inflicted on the composer's brother Johann, apothecary at Linz, by the biographers of the former with regard to the notorious quarrels which had existed between the two brothers, and the lecturer also showed the encouragement and assistance given to the master by the Austrian aristocracy and the Viennese musicians in general to have been considerably underrated. Dr. Hanslick likewise dwelt in his critical remarks on the master's relations to the Countess Julia Guicciardi, to Therese v. Bruns and Theresa Malfatti, and declared the well-known three letters of Bettina v. Armin, referring to the famous Goethe-Beethoven scene at Karlsbad, to be apocryphal, just as Beethoven's refusal to receive Rossini is (as Hanslick had from Rossini's own lips) absolutely without foundation.

The attention of our readers may here be directed to three letters by Beethoven, dating from March, 1820, and bearing exclusively on his troubles in connection with his scapegrace nephew, which were communicated to the Vienna Neue Freie Presse, by Dr. Gerhard v. Breuning, son of Beethoven's most intimate and faithful friend, for first publication in that paper, and reprinted in the Berlin Allgemeine Musikzeitung of February 10 last.

PAGANINI AND LISZT.

By G. Mazzucato.

> Hermione: "Pray you, set by us and tell's a tale."
> Mammillius: "Merry or sad shall it be?"
> Herm.: "As merry as you will."
> Mam.: "A sad tale's best for winter; I have one of spirits and goblins."—Winter's Tale.

This is what I heard at an old-fashioned, dingy, battered, tumble-down looking inn, on the Splügen-route, one of the few desolate relics of the stage coach era, where, however, even in these days of double-distilled civilisation, and hotels "especially built to meet all the requirements of visitors, carpets all over the house, electric bells, coffee rooms for ladies, reading rooms, billiard rooms, lawn tennis grounds, cold and hot baths, post and telegraph office, and English chapel on the premises'—holiday-makers of the male sex not helplessly spoilt by ultra-genteel notions, may, to their advantage, condescend to stop and sit down at a not recherché but healthy and copious meal, accompanied by an unlimited supply of unpretending, but unadulterated wine from the wood, and by an honest, though unadorned and unscientific chat with the wits of the place.

The company I met there assembled, reposing in a pleasant variety of lazy attitudes, according to their several tastes, on a wooden bench, a rough stone table and the cracked steps leading to the door that gave admittance to the huge, black banqueting hall of the establishment, was, though small, not very select; but as it was perhaps the best produce in the line of society to be had in that particular quarter of the world at ever so many feet above the sea level, it was no use being very squeamish. There were more instincts than refinement, more heads than hats, more men than clothes, more toes than shoes, and more pockets than coin: an innkeeper, an old boor, a young boor, two herdboys, and holiday makers from across the channel made up the total; and the rustic assembly were lazily enjoying their smoke and their wine in the twilight, under the rich primeval canopy of the sky, fanned by the primeval mountain-breeze, loaded with the primeval perfume of the pine and fir trees, from the surrounding dark, endless forest.

The talk was of ghosts, a topic by no means uncommon, especially at night, amongst Italian mountaineers; and the old boor, after a puff at his pipe, a pull at his glass, and another puff at his pipe, by way of strengthening up his oratorical powers, turned round to the holiday maker, who had made a silly attempt or two to poke fun at this grave subject, and spoke as follows:—

"I see what you mean, sir, and though we are not as learned as you, because the sun has eaten up our books, yet we can perceive that you are chaffing us. You who live in big towns, where there are so many houses, and people, and things to talk about, don't believe in ghosts; but if you had been living from boyhood in these lonely places, and had seen what we see here sometimes, perhaps, sir, you might have quite another way of thinking. Well, sir, speaking for myself, I am a religious man, and don't believe what the chaps that come home from the army say about God, and heaven, and hell, and that there is no such thing, and that when we die body and soul are all over. I think that, by the grace of God, when my turn comes, I shall go to a better world, and meet there all the souls of those who have tried to do the best they could, according to their lights while down here; and I think that the wicked souls who lived without fear of God and returned evil for good will part company with us on the other side of the grave, and go for ever to another place where it is too late for repentance. Now, sir, have we not all heard, and you that can read books have certainly found it written in them, that even in old times the souls of the dead came back and wandered over the face of the earth? And what happened in the olden times why could it not happen again nowadays?

"Of course, sir, there are ghosts and ghosts, and a man in his right senses must not believe all the stories that fools have invented about them. Ghosts that as soon as the sun sets, stalk about the graveyard, or pluck the bedclothes off your back, or tweak the noses of the people huddling together round the kitchen fire, or frighten the naughty girls out of their wits from behind the hedges when they pass through dark lanes at night, are stupid stuff, only just good enough for old women to keep the noisy brats from mischief. There's not an inch of these mountains where I have not been, by day or night, in fair or foul weather; and many a time, coming up all by myself of a pitch dark night, so dark that you could not have seen your hand, had you held it before your eyes, I heard the church clock strike twelve just as I was going along the walls of the cemetery; well, sir, I crossed myself, and said a requiem for the poor dead, and they left me in peace.

"But when we come to speak of St. John's night, that's quite another thing, sir, quite another thing; and if you, or even the king himself were to come here and deny that the spirits are abroad on that night, they would be abroad quite the same whether you believed it or not. If you have not seen them, it does not matter; so much the better for you, and I wish you may never be in their way as long as you live; but plenty of people have not been as lucky as you have, and I myself had such an experience of it that I shall not forget it to my dying day; no, sir, not even if I were to live my life twice over again.

"I am a very old man, and for all I can do in this world, I might just as well have been in my grave these ever so many years, and made room for others. I carry seventy-five years on my back, and as I always kept my eyes wide open, I have seen lots of things in these seventy-five years, and, mind, sir, I don't remember one, only one single St. John's night having passed, without my hearing of some devilry having happened. If I were to tell you all the stories I heard about it, we might sit here until to-morrow morning and not have done with it; but I will only tell you what happened to myself, here, in this place, one night many years ago; these very walls, this table here, if they could speak, might say something, I tell you.

"It is, I should say, some fifty years ago, a little more or less—the years in these mountains are very much like one another, and we don't take much trouble in reckoning them up—but I remember it was on the 23rd of June, St. John's Eve. In that year it fell on a Saturday, and my father and I had come up here with a basket of bread for Georgy, the innkeeper, this Georgy's grandfather, who, bless his soul, used to give us much better and much cheaper wine than this rascal does nowadays. On that Saturday afternoon there had been a terrific storm, such as seldom is witnessed now in these parts, where it seems always blowing. It caught us just half way from Chaivenna, and we had to stop for a couple of hours under the second gallery. That was a storm! Lightning, thunder, water, hail, snow, wind—it seemed the end of the world had come, and had it begun half-an-hour later, when we were farther up, it would have pitched both of us with cart, ass, and all into the river at the bottom of the ravine. Toward sunset, however, it cleared up beautifully, and as we were here chatting with Georgy and giving a hand at changing the horses of the mail-coach from Coira which was nearly four hours late, except for the wind that was still pretty strong, it was altogether a glorious morning. The conductor was telling us that at the summit the storm had been something awful, and that in several places the road was almost impracticable.

"Well, the mail-coach had not been gone more than half-an-hour, and we were talking here just as we are now, Georgy and five or six other chaps, when, all of a sudden, we noticed amongst us a queer, dark-looking personage, with a black box in his hands, leaning against that side of the table, and saying in a gruff and dusky voice: 'The axle, the springs, the wheels, the pole, the shafts, and I don't know what the deuce else of my carriage are broken; run up somebody and assist my men; and give me a drop of something strong, and a dry corner in the kitchen, in the stables, in the pigstye, anywhere to lie down, for I am half dead.' While unburthening himself of this short speech, he dived into his pocket, took out a handful of money, and flung it to the stable boys. They picked it up before it could touch the ground, and away they went like a shot, and Georgy respectfully signifying to the stranger that he would find at the inn everything he would be pleased to order, led the way into the house, offering, at the same time, to take the box from the traveller's hand, but he gave a kind of grunt, lifted up the box high over his head, out of any possible reach, and disappeared with the landlord in the dark passage.

Reviews.

VOCAL.

Decidedly worthy of a foremost place among the vocal music recently to hand, is a collection of "Eight German Songs," by Liza Lehmann (Chappell and Co.), in which cultivated amateurs will readily recognise evidence of a refined imagination and high musical aim. It may be unhesitatingly recommended to the attention of vocalists who sympathise with such qualities, and are able to appreciate the artistic use of musical means for conveying the sense and varied expression of the words which have here been employed by the composer. Very admirable in this respect are the setting of Heine's lyric, "Lieb Liechen, Leg's Händchen," and of Uhland's dramatic and pathetic ballade, "Der Wirthin Töchterlein." Among the smaller songs, "Wiegenlied," with the plaintive character given to the melody by the use of an augmented second, strikes us as particularly charming, but where all are so good, the question of preference may safely be left to individual tastes. The English version of the words that has been added should have the effect of gaining still wider acceptance for this little collection. Merit of a similar kind is discernible in two other songs, by the same composer, issued in separate sheet form, "Lullaby of an Infant Chieftain" (Sir Walter Scott's words), and "If thou wilt be the falling dew" (Folk Song of Provence), the last of which ought to become very popular (both Chappell and Co.)

Messrs. Stanley Lucas & Co. send five settings from Longfellow's "Voices of the Night," by F. S. Dugmore, all written in educated style, and possessing fair interest. The accompaniments are intended for organ or pianoforte, and would probably prove most effective when played on the former instrument. In "Hymn to the Night," there is an added part for violoncello, ad libitum, and the violin is similarly introduced in "The Light of Stars," and "The Psalm of Life," in each case with excellent effect; while the opportunities for expressive treatment offered by the well known "Footsteps of Angels," and "The Reaper and the Flowers," have been duly recognised by the composer. "Fate," by Mary H. Synge (W. H. Ross), is a well written song, exhibiting considerable musical feeling. There is merit also in "Give us Peace," by G. Monteith (Swan & Co.). "The Lovers' Walk," by Henry Tolhurst (same publishers) has good chance of favour with drawing-room singers. Mention should not be omitted of a very pleasing trio for female voices, entitled "Spring," by M. H. Synge (Cramer & Co.)

BOOKS.

That Mr. Charles Lunn's treatise upon "The Philosophy of the Voice" (Ballière, Tindale, & Co.) should have now reached its sixth edition, may, taken by itself, be regarded as presumptive evidence that its contents are of a nature to claim more than ordinary attention from the various classes of readers directly or indirectly concerned in the subject of which it treats. And, as a matter of fact, this little work, by reason of the evident industry with which the author has conducted his researches, his elaborate collection of facts, his strongly marked opinions, and the argumentative and, at times, trenchant style in which he maintains them, has aroused considerable interest and the usual amount of discussion that statements, put forward with any degree of authority, relating to the vexed question of voice-production, scarcely ever fail to elicit. Addressed to singers and speakers alike, Mr. Lunn's book confines reference to musical matters strictly within the limits prescribed by his subject, and what, in his opinions, those limits are may be inferred from the following and other similar sentences:—"A voice trainer should not be too musical —indeed, he need but know his notes, but he must know many things rarely or never included in a musician's education." With the remembrance still fresh in our minds of a rather prolonged discussion upon this very subject, which broke out in our columns sometime ago, reaching eventually a point of liveliness that nearly bordered upon acrimony, we are naturally nervous of doing more than briefly touch upon some of the main tendencies of the arguments presented in the present instance. Still more unwilling should we be to hazard remarks likely, by any latitude of interpretation, to be construed into a disposition to enter a fray in which, in our opinion, there has already been much needless waste of force, without adequate benefit to the cause of art by way of compensation. Mr. Lunn is a staunch advocate of the principles which formed the basis of the old Italian method, and upholds, in most of its essential particulars, the teaching of Garcia. Whatever divergence of opinion may exist on other points, few, we imagine, would be disposed to deny that hard facts are in his favour when he claims for voices trained in the old school, superiority of volume and durability. The unabated power and richness of Alboni's voice—to cite a single instance—remains to this day a matter of astonishment among those of her private friends who are fortunate enough to hear her sing at the periodical receptions she is in the habit of giving at Paris. The appearance of this artist at Rossini's funeral called forth at the time the following remarks from one who was present: "The splendour of her massive voice was a revelation to many. The greatest voice that has been heard in our generation has lost nothing of its pristine luscious sweetness. The style, moreover, of a vocalist belongs to a former school, the secret of which seems to have been lost." And we may, at any rate, venture the assertion, that any vocalist, whatever his method, or whatever his special predilections, neglecting to acquaint himself with the leading features of a school which has produced such great results, and with whose traditions are associated the names of so many artists destined to hold a permanent place in the history of the lyric stage, can in nowise be deemed to have covered the whole field of his legitimate and necessary studies. Of the physiological details here somewhat elaborately discussed, some will prove interesting to the general reader, while the others he will probably be disposed to leave to those qualified by special training to understand them. In addition, the author has given practical effect to his theories, in a series of "laws," in which his side of the case obtains lucid statement, and these are likely to have interest and suggestiveness, even for those who disagree with him.

The Organ World.

A LITTLE ORGAN GOSSIP.

Some one has told us that "the world changes but little;" and an examination of old books and papers is generally a good corrective for our self-sufficient modern ideas.

It is a common notion in the musical world that music has only just been revived in this country, after a long sleep of greater duration than the lengthy repose of Washington Irving's mythical hero "Rip Van Winkle." But this is, in a great measure, erroneous, it having been shown that the cultivation of orchestral music was more common, though brass bands were yet in their infancy, sixty years ago than now, nearly every town having its little or fairly large string band; and, to come to the organist's world, despite the absence of our fine modern instrument and our ignorance of the labours of J. S. Bach, there was a good deal of interest taken in organists and organ playing even in the last century. Some few years ago, Mr. W. H. Cummings, whose antiquarian researches are worthy of his high reputation as an accomplished musician and well-read artist, gave a lecture before the College of Organists, in which he made known many interesting particulars anent the English musicians of the period immediately following Handel.

Mr. Cummings gave an account of a society in London giving some twenty concerts annually and supported by a body of 400 subscribers. This association, extending its labours from 1710 to nearly the close of the century, was under the direction of leading organists of the time, including Greene, Bates, Pepusch, Cooke, Nares, &c. The music performed under such direction was, as might be expected, not only the best of the age, but was often of marked historical interest.

It is pleasant to note, again, the help given by organists to Sir John Hawkins in the compilation of his "History of Music;" assistance of a kind showing that then, as now, our organists were justly accounted to be men well read in the art they followed, for Dr. Boyce corrected plates, and Dr. Cooke aided in reducing ancient music to modern notation.

The battle of pitch was being fought a hundred years ago, much as the struggle goes on fitfully in our days from time to time. We read that the organ at St. James's Chapel Royal was, at the request of Dr. Dupuis, lowered half a tone at the cost of £100, and the organ at St. Paul's Cathedral appears to have been lowered in pitch in a similar manner. A curious note concerning the Southwell Minster organ tells us that it was originally built by Father Smith, and repaired by Snetzler, whereas the evidence in existence goes to prove that the instrument was entirely built by the last-named maker. Among the interesting notes brought to light by Mr. Cummings was the statement by Dr. Dupuis, that Handel, in playing the organ or harpsichord, passed his thumb under his fingers, a statement showing that the great composer was, technically, a player somewhat in advance of most performers of his day. Concerning cathedral usages, we learn that at Gloucester choral service was given up during a portion of the last century, and afterwards revived, and that at Lincoln there seems to have been a practice of using double chants in the morning, and single in the afternoon. There prevailed at St. Botolph's, Bishopsgate, and no doubt elsewhere, a practice of playing voluntaries at the "Gloria Patri," of the psalms; a curious habit one would be glad to know more about. The practice of playing long middle voluntaries at the lessons, either before or after, prevailed extensively, and continued to be the rule right into the early part of the present century.

Organists were, like clergymen, pluralists, in the good old days. Travers, whose church music is well known, held, for instance, three appointments at the Chapel Royal, St. Paul's, Covent Garden, and Fulham Parish Church. This method of professional life was followed by many leading organists, indeed it seems to have been the rule; and we find Thomas Adams and the Wesleys illustrating the possession of such professional power and popularity in days much nearer our own.

Voluntaries appear to have had very attentive listeners in the eighteenth century, and organ lovers travelled from church to church to listen, now to blind Stanley at the Temple, and again to some other celebrity elsewhere. The voluntary after service was often a veritable recital indeed; and it may be questioned whether, in our boasted advance in all things musical, we pay much more attention to our organists than our forefathers did. However, this gossip must cease for the present.

STORY OF THE OLD ORGAN IN THE CATHEDRAL "BEATÆ MARIÆ VIRGINIS," IN WOLFENBUTTEL.

IV.

Written from information in existing documents by Selmar Muller, and translated by F. E. T.

The richly carved organ case is in keeping with the Renaissance style of the church. Its present form is most likely the original one in all main points; it has only experienced some changes. In 1766 the choir was removed and taken into the general case.

The case as it now stands consists of round towers and panels in three storeys, and is of considerable height. The lower storey contains in the middle the keyboards and stops, and on either side two large round towers, to which are affixed wide panel shutters. The towers and panels are ornamented with pillars, and over them are wide projecting cornices.

In the lower towers and panels stand the large pipes of the principal bass, 16 feet, of English tin. The second storey is of similar form, with towers and side panels. Under this, and over the key board, is the present front case, appearing like a small organ. The wind chests for the great are in the second storey, and the 16 feet diapason is in front. The third storey contains the wind chests belonging to the upper manual, with the eight feet diapason in front. The middle tower is ornamented with the figure of an angel, holding a palm branch in one hand and a laurel wreath in the other. The whole is completed with pointed arches. The case is ornamented with many figures, holding various musical instruments in their hands, and with their faces turned to the organ. The instruments held by these angels include a zither, lute, cornet, flute, violin, trumpet, and harp. A colossal figure is holding a trombone, and another smaller angel is playing the kettle-drums. Large royal escutcheons are attached to the front of the case. The carving is throughout of a highly-finished order. The ground colour is black, which throws into prominence the brightly-polished front pipes, the rich mass of gilding, and the flesh tints of the figures. All alterations and enlargements in the organ have been effected with due care to leave the beautiful painting and gilding uninjured. The bare organ case was made by George Hubscher, a cabinet maker, of Salzburg, for which he received 414 thalers. The wood carver, by name Frederich Pruss, was paid 1,049 thalers for carving pillars, pedestals, capitols, etc. The painter, Heinrich Dedecken, received 428 thalers for his work, and the gilding alone cost over 1,065 thalers. The decorative process must have been spread over several years, ending in about 1623. Various necessary repairs are mentioned as taking place in 1638 and 1695, as also the addition of five new stops to replace others which had become unusable and out of date.

THE ORGAN AND THE CLASSICS.

In fact, when Mozart visited London and played to George III. and Queen Elizabeth, we find "he surpassed his clevier playing when he sat down to the King's organ." In 1775 he commenced writing the series of fifteen organ sonatas, the last of which was probably written in 1778. Most of these are written for strings and organ; in some, the organ part is written out more or less fully. Especially is this the case in the last, which Otto Jahn thinks Mozart wrote for his own special use. In two of them (No. 12 and 14) oboes, trumpets, horns, and drums are added to the orchestral accompaniment.

They were intended for use at High Mass, between the Gloria and Credo; and it is worthy of note that all Mozart's works with organ were written during those three years, 1775, 76, and 77, years which we may call the only quiet ones in his eventful life. At the close of this year he was appointed, through his father's instrumentality, organist and deputy-capellmeister of Salzburg Cathedral, with a salary of 500 gulden.

During his sixth professional tour we found him playing the organ at the Thomas Church, at Leipsic, in such a wonderful way that Doles, the cantor, a pupil of Bach, declared that his old master, Sebastian Bach, had risen again.

We find, then, that Mozart was a brilliant organist, a great extemporiser, and, during a portion of his life, a composer for our instrument, while in his choral writings the organ is frequently made use of with the most charming effect.

Still, as we have seen in the case of Haydn, Mozart's bent was not "organic," if I may use the word in that sense; and at this, if we consider the nature, as regards religion, of the time he lived in and the taste of that age, we cannot be surprised. Church music was then regarded not as a development of the sense of the words, but as an attraction to a pageant; it is natural, therefore, that church musicians should take but a somewhat superficial view of duties which being almost secular in their style, yet afforded them far less opportunities than did secular music proper.

Thus, with Mozart's departure to Vienna, we lose trace of the organ in his life. In fact, Hadyn and Mozart were merely organists in name, not in nature.

I turn now to the mighty Beethoven, the Colossus of the classics, and will endeavour to show in what way he was associated with the organ.

Firstly, I might mention that there would seem to have been some peculiar view taken as regards musical boys learning the organ, for in the lives of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, we find no definite trace of when they began to play the instrument, or who taught them.

We found Haydn taught himself, Mozart surprised his father by playing pedals and manual, being so small, by the way, that he had to stand up on the pedals to do it. Beethoven, we read, played as a very small boy in the Minorites Church, at six every morning.

His first regular lessons seem to have been given by the old organist, Van der Eeden, who had been over 50 years in his post at Bonn, he having entered the service of the Duke, before the advent of the first Beethoven.

Perhaps, says Thayer, he had the wish to do a dead friend thereby a service, that he trained his grandson to be his successor and companion. Beethoven often conversed, in his later years, with Schindler over the old organist, when conversation led them to speak of the strange positions and movements of the body and hands by organ and piano playing. He was taught, he said, to keep both quiet and even. When his studies under Van der Eeden began and ended, if they confined themselves to the organ alone, are questions to which Thayer in his great biography of Beethoven can give no answer.

In 1781, when Beethoven was 11, his father definitely settled that he should become an organist, as by this means he could most easily make use of his talent.

The appointment of Neefe would of course, as Thayer says, dispel the idea that Ludwig could be Van der Eeden's successor, but it soon became equally apparent that with all the duties that Neefe had to perform, an assistant was absolutely necessary, and to this of course the lad could aspire, and as matter of fact did attain.

Schlosser tells us that on Neefe's appointment to the post of organist, the Prince especially desired him to make the training of Beethoven his special care.

Of the great friendship that existed on Neefe's part towards Beethoven there is no doubt; it was therefore most natural that, needing a deputy to assist at the chapel organ, he should take up the talented pupil of Van der Eeden, without offering him any further remuneration than his personal assistance in his studies.

Beethoven was then 11. Thayer gives us such an interesting glance at the boy organist and his duties that I shall translate the whole passage:—"The position of Neefe's assistant was no sinecure; although bringing not so much direct duty, yet it had its attendant worries. The old organ was destroyed by fire in 1777, and a little chamber instrument had taken its place. Through the ever-recurring necessity of attendance, the position became irksome. On all Sundays and festivals there was High Mass at 11, and Vespers at 3, and sometimes at 4, Vespers being always sung by the Prince's Court Choir. On all Wednesdays in Lent the Miserere was sung at 5, and on Fridays the "Stabat Mater," while every Saturday at 3 Litany was sung at the altar of Our Lady of Loretto. Daily throughout the year there was Mass at 9 and 11, and Sundays at 9, 10, 11, the latter being High Mass. This programme, at all events, gave the organist something to do, and as Neefe left Bonn for Münster on 20th June, 1782, he certainly did not leave his little twelve-year-old pupil a sinecure."

Having deputised gratuitously for three years, we find Beethoven, in 1784, petitioning the Court for a salary; his petition was graciously heard, but ere the sum could be fixed that he was to have, the Prince died, and the whole Court was disbanded.

In a note-book, we find in the inside of the cover the measure of the pedals of the Minorite Church, from which note Wegeler supposes him to have been acquainted with the larger organ.

Notwithstanding the failure of his petition, he still continued to play for Neefe; and Wegeler, on the authority of Franz Ries, tells the following amusing story of Beethoven as an organist:—

On Tuesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays in Holy Week, parts of the "Lamentations of Jeremiah" were sung by a single voice to a simple musical phrase, with pianoforte accompaniment—the use of the organ being forbidden during Holy Week.

The chant seems to be a version of the "First Gregorian Tone" with a strange ending.

In the week ending March 27, 1785, Ferdinand Hiller was the reciting singer, an excellent vocalist, and good musician, although insufferably conceited. In conversation with Beethoven, he said that nothing could throw him out of his key while he was singing; whereupon Beethoven wagered to do it. The following day, while the singer sang the recitation of the long Latin text on the reciting notes, the player let loose his fancy in harmonisation, and while holding the singer's reciting note with the little finger of his right hand, he so arranged the harmony that when the cadence came the poor singer was absolutely at a loss to find his key to finish in.

Hiller was in a fury, and went at once to the Prince and complained of Beethoven, who was at once summoned to the Prince's presence. He, however, appreciating the joke, pardoned the culprit, only adding that he was not to commit such "strokes of genius" again.

From the time that Beethoven left Bonn till the close of his life we find no record that he again touched the organ.

Turning now to his compositions, we find the organ only mentioned three times. Only once in instrumental composition, and even that in a very dubious case. Op. 39, composed in 1789 and published in 1803, is engraved as two preludes through all major keys for piano or organ, but on the original manuscript no name of instrument is mentioned.

In choral works we find the organ used with the orchestra in both the great masses—that in C and in the Missa Solennis.

In the former the treatment of the instrument is not very important, the part assigned to it being sustaining harmonies or marking with all its power a modulation. The part consists but of a figured bass with the usual marks of tasto solo, and full organ and p. and f. marks. No suggestions are made as to registering, and the instrument is treated as a "filling up" instrument, sometimes with loud effects as in the "Cum Sancto Spiritu," sometimes with soft passages as in the "Agnus Dei" and the "Dona nobis."

A NEW METHOD OF OPENING SWELL SHUTTERS.

A new and recently patented invention, the patentee being Mr. Henry Fordham, of 43, Argyle-square, W.C., is an ingenious mechanism whereby the swell venetians may be gradually opened at the will of the player from any point—from the upper, centre, or low shutters. This is effected by a gradation rod turning on a spindle. The slots of the gradation rod take the short arms attached to the shutters and open them in differently-arranged orders at the will of the performer, who can bring the various mechanisms into operation or detach them by a simple draw-stop movement. The invention may be applied to any existing swell, and it requires but little space, no more, in fact, than is always secured by the position of the swell-box and its venetians. The mechanism includes the power of hermetically closing the shutters. Not only is increased effect given to the swell crescendo, but varied effects are secured by the power the player has at his command to make slight openings, and to let the sound out from various points. It is hoped that an opportunity will be afforded to Mr. Fordham to display and explain his well-thought-out and effective contrivance to organists and others interested in the development of the valuable and striking tone variations supplied by the swell organ.

ENGLISH CHURCH MUSIC.

To the Editor of THE ORGAN WORLD.

Sir,—The contents of the letter in last week's Organ World, bearing the signature of the distinguished Professor of Music to the University of Cambridge, Dr. C. Villiers Stanford, will have been read with great satisfaction by all who have the future welfare of English Church Music really and seriously at heart. Moreover, one or two of the subjects therein referred to are brought to the front most opportunely.

For the past twenty years the College of Organists has been engaged in the important and good work of inciting the young Church Organists to enlarge the bounds of their professional knowledge and education, with the result that at no previous period was the United Kingdom so amply provided with accomplished and trustworthy professional musicians as at the present time.

A few months before the death of the late Archbishop of Canterbury (Dr. Tait), that Prelate announced—I think it was in a visitation charge—that steps were about to be taken to improve the condition and efficiency of the music in our cathedral and other churches. (I do not vouch for the exact words, as I am writing from memory.)

A Bill is, unless I am mistaken, before the House of Lords at the present time, the object of which is to carry into effect this supremely important object.

The details of that Bill have not, I think, been made public, but one may venture to point out what should be among its most prominent provisions. It is well known that not many centuries ago the religious houses were the chief seats of learning, and that, by placing the management of the music in cathedral and other churches under ecclesiastical guidance, and not lay, it was being put into the best-informed and most competent hands. But the condition of things is not the same now as then. Lay education in sacred musical matters has progressed enormously within the last twenty years. Not so the clerical, and the "friction" to which Dr. Stanford delicately refers, is frequently to be attributed to the fact that in cathedrals, in the great majority of cases, "the chief musician," as the late Dr. Wesley used to designate the precentor, would perhaps not be able to describe the harmonic construction of the first twenty bars of a new anthem, if asked for such information by his choir. In parish churches, similarly, the clergyman—and the same with his curate—will rarely be able to explain the harmonies and form of even the simplest hymn-tune to any inquirer.

In the absence of all knowledge of what the Bill before the House of Lords may contain, the hope may be entertained that what the College of Organists has done for the organists, the bench of Bishops proposes doing to improve the musical efficiency of the clergy, and so remove from that respected body the reproach which, at present, is not without some show of foundation, that they grasp at the shadow and nip the substance.

I have done little more than touch the fringe of the matter, as I am fearful of making too great a demand on your valuable space.—Faithfully yours, J. K.

May 22nd, 1888.

SPECIFICATION.

ST. MICHAEL'S CHURCH, BISHOP'S STORTFORD.—The following is the scheme of the new organ built by Mr. A. Kirkland, of 655, Holloway-road, N.:—

RECITAL NEWS.

ST. MARK'S CHURCH, TOLLINGTON PARK.—An Organ Recital was given by Mr. J. Hurst, A.C.O., Organist of the Church, on May 18th, 1888. The programme included the following:—

"Prelude and Fugue in E Minor"	J. S. Bach.
Mr. J. Hurst.
Anthem, "O how amiable are Thy dwellings"	J. Barnby.
Air, "I know that my Redeemer liveth"	Handel.
Master H. Humm.
Variations on the Choral "Nun danket alle Gott"	J. T. Pye.
Mr. J. Hurst.
Duet, "They shall hunger no more." (The Holy City)	A. R. Gaul.
Masters H. Humm and C. Steward.
Anthem, "O taste and see"	J. Hurst.
Air, "It is enough" (Elijah)	Mendelssohn.
Mr. R. Finlayson.
"Pastorale"	Wely.
Mr. J. Hurst.
Air, "I will love Thee, O Lord." (The Woman of Samaria)	W. Sterndale Bennett.
Master C. Steward.
Duet, "I waited for the Lord." (Hymn of Praise)	Mendelssohn.
Cantiléne A Minor	Salome.
Grand Chœur A Major	,,
Mr. J. Hurst.
Recessional March in B Flat Major	J. Hurst.

SHERBORNE ABBEY CHURCH.—As usual on the evening of Ascension Day, a special musical service was held. "St. Philip," a short oratorio by Mr. G. E. Lyle, the talented organist, was given for the first time, and there was a large congregation present. The oratorio is a composition of considerable merit, containing 28 numbers, all of which went steadily and well, with the exception of the last chorus, in which the choir were a little unsteady at the beginning, but afterwards improved. The soloists were Miss Hardy (soprano), Mrs. Roxby (contralto), and Mr. J. Witherington (tenor), who satisfactorily performed their parts.

ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, SPITTLEGATE, GRANTHAM.—An organ recital was given on May 18th by Mr. G. Porter, F.C.O. Programme:—

Overture	Handel.
Adagio Cantabile	A. Page.
Prelude and Fugue	J. S. Bach.
Adagio Cantabile in D	E. J. Hopkins.
Con Moto Moderato	H. Smart.
Adagio in E	Merkel.
Concert Stück	C. H. Rink.
Andante Espressivo	Kalkbrenner.
Offertoire in A flat	Salome.
March (arr: Stainer)	Zimmermann.

Geo. H. Porter, F.C.O., Organist South Parish Church.

ST. NICHOLAS, DEPTFORD.—The organ in this church, which was built by Father Smith in 1697, has been cleaned and repaired by Messrs. Bishop and Son, and was re-opened on Thursday, the 17th instant, by Dr. Jacob Bradford. The following is the programme of the recital, which was interspersed with anthems and vocal solos:—

Organ Sonata, No. 2	Mendelssohn.
Minuet and Trio	Sterndale Bennett.
March of Israelitish Warriors	Bradford.
Christmas Pastorale	Corelli.
Fanfare	Lemmens.
Cujus Animam	Rossini.
Hallelujah Chorus	Handel.
Occasional Overture	Handel.

On Sunday evening a short recital was given after the service by the organist, Miss A. M. Herroun, F.C.O., which included the following items:—

Organ Sonata, No. 4	Mendelssohn.
Vocal solo, "There is a green hill"	Gounod.
Gran Coro Trionfale	Capocci.
Anthem, "Worship and Praise"	Iliffe.
Allegretto Pastorale	Warwick Jordan.
Vocal solo, "The King of Love"	Gounod.
Barcarolle	Sterndale Bennett.
Triumphal March	Costa.

Programme of recital given by Mr. H. W. Weston, F.C.O., at Balham Parish Church, on Whit Sunday after Evensong:—

Marche du Sacre (Le Prophite)	Meyerbeer.
Andante (Holsworthy Church Bells)	S. S. Wesley.
Barcarolle in F	W. Sterndale Bennett.
(From 4th Pianoforte Concerto.)
Introduction and Allegro in D	Handel.
(Organ Concerto in D minor.)
Meditation in E flat (MSS.)	H. W. Weston.
Intermezzo and Fugue upon a Church theme (Pastorale Sonata, op. 88.)	J. Rheinberger.

On May 17th, Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," and Sullivan's "In Memoriam" overture were given at St. Gabriel's, Pimlico, in a manner reflecting very high credit upon the organist, Mr. H. W. Wetton, A.C.O., the occasion being the annual Dedication Festival of the church. There was a large and efficient choir, and an excellent and complete orchestra. In the unavoidable absence of Dr. J. F. Bridge, Mr. E. H. Turpin acted as conductor.

GODALMING PARISH CHURCH.—An Organ Recital was given on May 25th, by Mr. F. de G. English, B.A., A.C.O.

Overture to "Samson"	Handel.
Adagio in D	Mozart.
Sonata in C minor, No. 2	Mendelssohn.
Andante with variations from Septett	Beethoven.
Prelude and Fugue in B minor	Bach.
Marche Nuptiale	Guilmant.
Concerto in A, No. 9	Corelli.
Fantasia in E minor	Merkel.
Duet (songs without words)	Mendelssohn.
Hallelujah, "Mount of Olives"	Beethoven.

Notes.

The remains of Dr. Creene, having been rescued from a city church doomed to demolition through the exertions of Mr. W. H. Cummings and Dr. Stainer, &c., were re-interred in St. Paul's Cathedral recently, and on May 18th Sir G. Grove, Drs. Martin, Bridge, Messrs. Cummings, Gadsley, and a large company of other musical celebrities met at the grave-side, when Mr. W. A. Barrett gave a very interesting account of the composer and organist of St. Paul's of the earlier half of last century.

Two French cathedral organists, M. Grison (Rheims) and M. Emile Lachmann, and two leading Australian organists, Messrs. G. F. Tendall and Hawtrie West, have been made honorary members of the College of Organists at a recent Council meeting.

Among recent gifts to the library of the College of Organists, one, of exceptional value, is a fine folio copy of Dr. S. S. Wesley's Anthems, kindly presented by the composer's son, the Rev. F. G. Wesley, M.A., of Durham.

The Council of the College of Organists sent a wreath and a letter of condolence, upon the occasion of the funeral of the late Mr. Henry Littleton. Among other gentlemen present connected with or representing the college, were Dr. Bridge (who, with Dr. Westbrook, the church organist, played the organ at the service, at St. Bartholomew's, Sydenham), Dr. Martin (a composition of whose was sung at the service), Dr. C. J. Frost, Mr. W. A. Barrett, Mus. Doc., Dr. H. Walmsley Little, etc.

A contemporary notes that:—"The position of St. Mary's Church at the principal entrance to Greenwich Park, the thronged resort of holiday makers, has induced the Church Council to commence a series of Sunday afternoon popular services in that church. The ordinary sermon will be replaced by a lecture by some well-known preacher, a selection from an oratorio, or an organ or string band recital. All seats will be free, and there will be no collection. The first service will be held to-morrow at 4 p.m. The Rev. G. M. Youngman, the curate in charge, or Mr. W. J. Annan Sharp, hon. sec. of St. Mary's Church Council, will be happy to receive any contributions towards the expenses of these services."

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS' CALENDAR.

On Tuesday next, the library will be opened from 7 to 10. Tuesday, June 12th, at 8, Mr. E. H. Turpin will complete his "Remarks on Elementary Orchestration." Students are again requested to bring copies of Beethoven's Sonatas for reference. June 26th, Lecture by Dr. C. W. Pearce; July 17th, 18th, 19th, F.C.O. Examination; July 20th, Diploma Distribution; July 24th, 25th, 26th, A.C.O. Examination; July 27th, Diploma Distribution. Other arrangements and particulars will be duly announced.

ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS.

You are kindly requested to write for Ainsworth's "New Patent Organ Pedal Combination List." Ainsworth's "New Patent" is perfectly unique and may be combined easily with any Piano. It is the only one which may be safely combined with any Piano without deteriorating the instrument. Having put down at my works two engines and machinery of the most desirable kind, I am now supplying my goods at a price which enables every organist and organ student to have always ready for use in his Studio an

ORGAN PEDAL PIANO,

Affording Perfectly Unique Pedal Practice.

34, Sheen Park, Richmond.

Dear Sir,—I have deferred writing to comment upon your Pedals and Action now attached to my pianoforte until I could satisfy myself of their utility and efficiency. I can now conscientiously say that they more than fulfil all my anticipations. Although I am no carpenter, aided by your lucid diagram I had little difficulty in attaching them myself, and it is impossible to over-estimate the comfort they give to me or to conceive the saving of time one experiences in one's own room.—Believe me, yours truly,

BURNHAM HORNER, F.R. Hist.S.

To Mr. Mr. Ainsworth.

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to bear testimony to the perfection of your Invention. I am more than satisfied with your Patent Action and Organ Pedals, and consider them worth double the money. Organists and organ students who desire to improve in the Art of Pedalling, which is so essential to a good organist, will do well to procure a set. I have seen no Action half so effective, and one can sit at the Piano and play, "Fixed in his everlasting seat," or any other organ music, or organ arrangement with the greatest pleasure. The touch of pedals could not be better, and the action is as you say, "Absolutely free from annoyances." They cannot be too highly recommended, as by their use, rapid progress is certain.—Believe me, sincerely yours,

I. B. Thornton,
Organist, Birstall, Leeds.

Cologne, July 16th, 1886.

My Dear Sir,—I have much pleasure in informing you that your Pedals have given the fullest satisfaction. I have them combined with my practice Piano. Many of my musical friends who have seen them, as well as my organ pupils, are quite delighted with them; and I must acknowledge that I have never met with any Pedals so noiseless and pleasant to play upon as yours. The Action I consider durable, and of very good workmanship. Every organist who desires to perfect his playing will welcome your invention. I can recommend your goods in every respect.—Yours truly,

Herr J. RODENKIRCHEN.

To John Ainsworth, Esq. Organist, The Cathedral, Cologne, Germany.

TOOLS.—In order to facilite the attachment, a complete set of tools are sent (four in number) each one marked for its particular use. By the use of these tools, and following carefully the directions, ANY ONE can make a really good attachment.

On Receipt of Trade or Professional Card, you will receive List, with Liberal Terms.

LICENSE.

Few among the stumbling-blocks that beset the path of young musical students are more discouraging than those arising out of the use, in numerous theoretical works, of this altogether vague and unsatisfactory word. If, by any stretch of the meaning of terms, faith can be placed in the saying, "exceptions prove the rule," on the other hand, where we are confronted with a formidable array of exceptions instead of one or very few, these go very far towards proving either the uselessness of the rule itself, or the imperfect way in which it has been enunciated. In these days, when the process of emancipation from old restrictions goes on apace in musical matters, it is worth consideration whether we shall not do well to banish the word "license" from our vocabulary altogether, and be content with the thought that a thing is either quite right or quite wrong. That the same thing can be both at different times and under different conditions, is, of course, another matter, and equally beyond dispute; but as circumstances thus alter cases, it is certainly rather absurd to harass and balk a young musician in his use of a given progression or movement of parts, or modification of form, with the insinuation that, though he may do it this time, it is only half right, and he had better not do it again. On what, after all, has the code of laws by which composers are supposed to be governed in the practice of their art for the most part been formulated? It may be safely answered—on the precedents supplied in the standard works of the great classical masters; precedents, it is true, which, when viewed collectively, show that those masters, too, in many cases all unconsciously, have worked in harmony with certain immutable laws, of which the science of acoustics steps in to give an account. Beyond, however, tracing the existence in classical masterpieces of this intuitive perception of natural facts, the much-vaunted science has done, and seems likely to do, little for the practical musician; his principal indebtedness to it consisting in the confirmatory evidence it affords of key relationship, in its explanations of the phenomena of concordant and discordant combinations and like matters; a kind of knowledge manifestly insufficient by itself to make a musical composer.

Not that music, any more than other arts, is without its fixed laws derived from fundamental principles, the knowledge of which is as indispensable to the would-be composer, as that of perspective and anatomy to the painter, or as grammatical construction to the writer; and until the observance of these has come to be a second nature with him, he will be incompetent to make free use of the resources of his art, and, indeed, without claim to be ranked among educated musicians. But unfortunately, in too many theoretical works, it has been the custom to mix indiscriminately laws which are immutable with others of a purely arbitrary kind, such as have to be relaxed from time to time, when taste changes, and artistic ideals become modified under the influences of new imaginative stimulus, and fresh influx of musical thought. Treated as a dead letter, for all the purposes of modern composition, such practically obsolete restrictions nevertheless demand attention from the learner in a certain stage of his studies, for two good reasons. In the first place, constant exercise, within the limits prescribed by them, afford the best preparatory discipline for enabling him hereafter to move and work easily under the conditions of greater freedom permitted in modern styles of composition. The other educational advantage to be derived from this sort of study is obvious enough. Without a thorough knowledge of the distinctive features of the old and modern schools, the learner is liable to confuse different styles, and thus to commit solecisms of a kind similar to those which disfigured the bastard architecture of the Renaissance. But it is one thing, whenever classical forms have been adopted, to enact rigid conformity to the restrictions imposed by those forms; another to ignore or prohibit the greater latitude afforded by modern development. Any infringements of rule in the first case will not be a "license," in the half extenuating sense the word has come to suggest, but should be described by the more uncompromising term, "barbarism." Innovations, in the latter case, will not be "licenses" in any sense, but simply admissible or inadmissible, according as they do, or do not, conform to those fundamental principles which form the basis of musical art in all ages.

The length of time it is desirable to confine the exercises of a student within the artificial limitations of strict counterpoint is a question worthy of consideration on the part of teachers. There is some danger that, by too long a subjection to arbitrary laws, he may presently come to regard as intrinsically wrong matters that are only incidentally wrong; that the shackles, in short, may be removed too late—with a permanent stiffness and awkwardness in the use of his powers for the result. It is quite possible to imagine, for instance, that long after undergoing exclusive training in strict counterpoint, some learners would be haunted by a vague sense of impropriety when exercising their newly-acquired freedom in the use of the interval of the fourth, of unprepared discords, and even of such chromatic harmonies as are no longer considered extreme in modern music. Certainly one comes across compositions, from time to time, showing considerable faculty in many respects, but suggestive also of restraint, and of partially developed imagination, such as may very often be attributable to this or similar causes. Not until the young musician shall have succeeded in disabusing his mind of some of the misleading notions frequently associated with the word "license," can his emancipation be considered complete.

IN RE MAPLESON.

The debtor, Mr. James Henry Mapleson, described as an operatic manager, formerly of the Royal Italian Opera House, Covent Garden, and Her Majesty's Theatre, Haymarket, applied to pass his examination. The receiving order was made on January 27 last, the liabilities being returned at £40,100, and there were no available assets. It appeared that Mr. Mapleson had been impresario of an opera company for the past 30 years. About the year 1875, having then an estimated capital of £9,000, he formed an enterprise for the erection of the National Opera House, to be situated on the Victoria Embankment, but, in consequence of difficulties in obtaining a proper foundation, which largely increased the building estimates, the scheme had to be abandoned. He attributed his failure mainly to the non-completion of the National Opera House, whereby he lost £30,000, and he explained the remainder of the deficiency by depreciation in the value of his theatrical properties, and by loss on his last London operatic season.

Mr. Howell appeared for the Official Receiver; Mr. M. S. Rubinstein, Mr. W. A. Colyer, and Mr. Osbaldeston for creditors; and Mr. Cole for the debtor.

Mr. Mapleson, in the course of his evidence, stated that in addition to the money, which he invested in the scheme for the erection of the National Opera House, his friends subscribed £60,000. The scheme was his, and he conducted all the negotiations with reference to the site. A large amount of promised support was withdrawn in consequence of a letter from Mr. Gye to the Times pointing out the impracticability of the scheme. The original estimate came to £250,000, of which £102,000 was expended on the building, and it was completed with the exception of the roof. Difficulties arose which increased the estimated expenditure, and, as he approached the roof, he found that the necessary capital was not forthcoming. The works were commenced about the year 1880, and he became personally liable for the ground-rent of £3,000 per year. There was an advising committee, which included the Duke of Sutherland and Lord Alfred Paget, and ultimately the property was sold with their approval in 1881 for £29,000, which the debenture-holders divided among themselves. For some of the liabilities appearing in his statement of affairs he received no consideration.

Mr. Howell asked the debtor whether he had not been insolvent since 1881?

The debtor did not admit that such was the fact; on the contrary, he did not become aware of his insolvent position until the receiving order was made. He went on to explain that there was a compromise between the debenture-holders, but he was not a party to it. In 1881, after the sale of the property, he had some liabilities outstanding which he hoped to pay out of his profits as operatic manager. Since then, in some years he had lost £10,000 or £15,000, and in other years he made £30,000 profits, and he had reduced his liabilities by £100,000. His income fluctuated according to the success which attended his operatic engagements. Last year's season was not satisfactory, and probably entailed a loss of £1,500 or £1,800. This result was due to Madame Patti having refused to sing because the house was not full. His theatrical properties, which had cost some thousands of pounds, were included in a bill of sale. He believed that his payments to Madame Patti had amounted to £300,000. Since 1882 he had not possessed any interest in Her Majesty's Theatre.

Replying to Mr. Rubinstein, the debtor said that nearly all his creditors were withdrawing their claims, and a testimonial was now being organised for his benefit.

The debtor was also briefly examined by Mr. Colyer and Mr. Cole, and passed his examination.

A scheme of arrangement of Mr. Mapleson's affairs has already been agreed to.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Thursday, May 17, Mdlle. Ella Russell, as Traviata, did remarkably well, and showed considerable improvement upon her last year's achievements, both as a singer and an actress. "Ah, fors è lui," and "Parigi o cara," were both much applauded, and in the dying scene, the lady looked extremely handsome, albeit a little too robust, according to the tenets of modern realism.

On Saturday, the interest of the performance of "Faust," centred in Madame Albani, and on Monday, Mdlle. Sigrid Arnoldson made her entrée as Zerlina, singing and acting the Spanish village coquette as daintily as could well be desired. Madame Fürsch-Madi, as Donna Anna, and Signor D'Andrade as the wicked Don, did fairly well, while Signor Ravelli's high chest notes showed to remarkable advantage in "Il mio tesoro." Don Ottavio, moreover, being what in familiar language is called a stick, Signor Ravelli realised the part to perfection.

Great credit is due to Madame Rolla, who took the part of Elvira at a moment's notice, the ill wind which prevented Miss MacIntyre from singing blowing much credit and renown to this enterprising lady.

On Tuesday "Rigoletto," with Mdme. Albani as Gilda, drew a full house; and on Thursday Mdme. Melba, the Australian prima donna, made her début as Lucia. Of this performance we must reserve notice until next week. We should add that the mis-en-scene was throughout excellent, and in "Faust" absolutely magnificent. In the same opera the additional chorus gathered together by Mr. Harris did good service. Signor Mancinelli has acted as conductor at all the performances, with the exception of that of "La Traviata," when Mr. Randegger wielded the bâton in a masterly manner.

Concerts.

EDVARD GRIEG'S CONCERT.

To the intrinsic interest of the programme presented at Herr Edvard Grieg's concert, given last Wednesday evening at St. James's Hall, a pleasant feature was added in the manifestly sympathetic attitude of an audience fully prepared to place themselves in cordial rapport with the Norwegian composer, whose claims to public favour, already made good by many charming songs and instrumental pieces, heard from time to time in our concert-rooms, were still further strengthened by his appearance at a recent Philharmonic concert in the threefold capacity of composer, pianist, and conductor. The pleasurable anticipations were fully realised; a fact that may be attributed not only to the part borne by Herr Grieg himself, but also to the admirable support of those who co-operated with him. Madame Norman-Neruda introduced no novelty to English musicians in the F major Sonata, op. 8, for pianoforte and violin, but the freshness and unflagging melody of this work, a veritable whiff of mountain air, instinct with the peculiar charm of northern folksong to which the composer never fails to add the stamp of his own original individuality, was still further revealed by a performance which, in some respects, may be fairly called unique. There is not a dull bar in the sonata from commencement to close, and, as the violinist was in her happiest vein, and played throughout con amore, and the composer was his own interpreter at the piano, the result was such as can be imagined. No less fortunate were the audience in the opportunity afforded them of hearing several of Grieg's songs rendered by Madame Nita Grieg, in a manner which may be deemed to have approached as nearly as possible a direct expression of the composer's intentions. Eminently characteristic, at times even a little peculiar in style, Madame Grieg's singing was so spontaneous and sincere, that she at once established friendly relations with her hearers, the beautiful lyric known in the English version as "I love thee," the veritable song-picture, "In the summer evening," and the short, rapturous "Good morning" being received with special favour. It was a style of singing that distinctly belonged to the music, and, needless to say, the composer's performances of the accompaniments still further enhanced the effect. Madame Neruda was again heard in "Romance and finale" from Sonata, op. 45, for piano and violin, a work full of beauty. An important feature was also, as a matter of course, Herr Grieg's performance of some pieces of his own composition for pianoforte alone. These included two attractive sketches, "On the mountains" and "Norwegian bridal procession" (the latter of which was given with special effect), some charming excerpts from his "humoresken," and various Norwegian folk-songs and dances. Altogether it was a concert likely to dwell pleasantly in the memories of those who attended it.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The fifth concert of the Philharmonic Society, given at St. James's Hall, on the evening of the 17th inst., was the occasion of the first performance of three "Mythological" pieces for orchestra, by Mr. E. Silas. These pieces, as the description applied to them by the composer indicates, are intended as musical illustrations of three heathen deities—Aphrodite, Vulcan, and Pan. The goddess is represented by a smoothly flowing melody in A major in 6-8 tempo, which, although it can hardly be said to possess any distinctive characteristics, is pleasing and gracefully orchestrated, an undulating accompaniment suggesting, without undue exaggeration, the waves to which Aphrodite owed her designation of Anadyomene. The gods have not inspired Mr. Silas to the same extent as the goddess, although the two movements representing them are replete with appropriate colour, a little of which might have been dispensed with in the case of Vulcan. Mr. Silas conducted the pieces himself, and met with a flattering reception at their conclusion. Madame Fürsch-Madi, who made her first appearance at these concerts in Beethoven's scena et aria, "Ah! perfido," displayed a fine voice and good command of dramatic effect, being heard to equal advantage in "O nea lyre immortelle," from Gounod's "Sapho." It was a matter for some regret that Beethoven's Symphony in C minor should have been substituted, "by desire," for Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique," which would probably have received a very fine interpretation from the Philharmonic orchestra; but the excellent rendering of the substituted work almost atoned for the disappointment. The feature of the concert, however, was undoubtedly the magnificent performance, by Madame Sophie Menter, of Liszt's stupendous Concerto in A major. Madame Menter infused such breadth and brilliancy into her reading of this exacting work, that the performance was nothing short of phenomenal, and she obtained such a recognition of the fact as is seldom heard in a concert-room, substituting Liszt's transcription of the march from Schubert's "Fantasie à l'Hongroise" for four hands as an encore. The remainder of the programme was made up of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and Weber's "Oberon" overture. Mr. Cowen, whose last appearance it was prior to his departure for Australia, was loudly cheered at the conclusion of the concert.

SENOR SARASATE'S SECOND CONCERT.

The near approach of the holidays in nowise affected the attendance in St, James's Hall on Saturday afternoon last, when Senor Sarasate gave his second orchestral concert. The appearance of Mr. W. G. Cusins as conductor of the exceedingly fine orchestra called forth enthusiastic applause, which was repeated to the echo at the close of the really fine performance of Liszt's Poéme Symphonique, "Les Préludes." Round after round of applause greeted the appearance of the Spanish virtuoso when he ascended the platform to play the musicianly concerto for violin and orchestra, by Mr. Mackenzie, which was produced for the first time at the last Birmingham Festival. The marvellous technique of Senor Sarasate was well evidenced in the "Symphonic Espagnole," by Lalo, but the violinist's own fantasia on airs from "Faust," was evidently most to the taste of the enormous audience, and secured for Senor Sarasate a most enthusiastic recall. A very fine performance was brought to a close by Weber's overture to "Preciosa."

MR. THEO. WERNER'S CONCERT.

The second of Mr. Theodore Werner's series of orchestral concerts, given at St. James's Hall, on Tuesday evening, May 15th, was attended by a fairly numerous and thoroughly appreciative audience. Mr. Werner, who is rapidly rising to a high place among violinists, was heard to great advantage in Spohr's Concerto in G minor, in Wieniawski's Concerto in D minor, and in a Fantasia on Hungarian airs for violin, by Ernst. The orchestra, conducted by Mr. August Manns, was an excellent one, and, besides supporting Mr. Werner, played with great sympathy, Beethoven's "Leonore" overture; Saint Saën's weird symphonic poem, "Le Rouet D'Omphale," with its droning spinning-wheel accompaniment; Schubert's unfinished symphony, and "The Marche Hongroise," from Berlioz's "Faust."

MISCELLANEOUS.

Mrs. and Miss M. Welman's First Musical and Dramatic Recital, given under the patronage of H.R.H. the Princess Mary, Duchess of Teck, at the Westminster Town Hall, on Tuesday evening, May 15, was an interesting performance. Mrs. Welman has a soprano voice, which was shown to possess much sweetness and flexibility in her rendering of Mendelssohn's famous duet, "Gruss," which she sung in company with Miss Hope Glenn, in "Voi che sapete," by Mozart; in Schubert's always welcome "Who is Sylvia?" and in Signor Randegger's "Peacefully Slumber." Miss Welman's contributions to the programme consisted entirely of recitations, her répertoire including two anonymous pieces, "The Eagle's Rock" and "The Lap Dog and his Doctor," and Mr. Anstey's delightful parody, "The Wreck of the s.s. Puffin."

The Penzance Choral Society gave a performance in St. John's Hall on Friday evening, May 11th, of Macfarren's "Lady of the Lake." The work was rendered with much ability, the chorus being admirably sung. The orchestral portion of the performance was a marked success. The soloists were Miss Violet Nunn, Mrs. Winiberg, Miss Millett, Mr. M. Sampson, Mr. Trebilcock, Mr. Lovell, and Mr. S. White. Miss Violet Nunn made her debut in the character of Ellen, and showed unmistakably that she fully possesses the musical ability of the family. Her singing was remarkably good, alike for distinctness of enunciation and sympathetic rendering. She thoroughly deserved the hearty applause which was accorded her. Mr. Harry Pearce was the leader of the band, and played the obbligati in Malcolm's song, "My hawk is tired." Mr. R. White, jun., presided at the organ, and Mr. J. H. Nunn conducted.

The North-East London Choral Society gave the second concert of the season at the Morley Hall, May 16th, when an admirable rendering of Gade's cantata, "The Crusaders," and a miscellaneous selection were listened to with evident appreciation by a fairly large and select audience. The solo vocali were Miss Kate Fusselle, Miss Rose Dafforne, Mr. T. W. Hanson, and Mr. Herbert Budge, who all acquitted themselves well; while Mr. Fountain Meen, and Mr. Louis B. Prout, as accompanists (pianoforte and harmonium), did much to enhance the effect of the excellent singing of the choir. In the miscellaneous part, Miss Mabel G. Watson received quite an ovation for her rendering of Vieuxtemp's "Air Varié," for violin. The conductor of the Society, Mr. John E. West, F.C.O., is to be congratulated on such successful results.

At Wood Green, on May 15th, a concert was given in aid of the Morley Seaside Home, St. Margaret's, near Dover. There was a good attendance, and the audience were not slow in recognising the ability of the principal artistes. Especially was their enthusiasm aroused by the brilliant performances, on the violin, of Miss Adela Duckham, 13 years of age, who gave Sarasate's "Ziguenerwasen," and "Andante and finale" from Mendelssohn's Concerto, and although there was a hard and fast rule that there should be no encores during the first part of the programme, the audience so persisted in their demands for one after her first solo, that the conductor complied with their wishes, and Miss Duckham gave Moskowski's "Gipsy Dances." In her second solo she was equally fortunate in pleasing her hearers. The pianoforte accompaniments to the violin solos were played by Miss Lilly von Kornatzki, who has made this art her special study. Another favourite artiste was Miss Clara Dowle, whose songs, "Poor wandering one" (Sullivan) and "She wandered down" (Clay), were the vocal successes of the evening. She was accompanied on the piano by Miss Adela Duckham.

At the first of Mr. Lawrence Kellie's vocal recitals at the Steinway Hall, a fair proportion of the programme was made up by compositions from his own pen. The most entirely successful of these perhaps were the three songs which he himself sung from an album of ten, which is now being published by Messrs. Metzler. If these are a fair example of the contents of the rest of the book, we can cordially recommend them to the notice of amateurs Two other songs, "She dwelt among the untrodden ways," and "The day has a thousand joys," by the same composer, were very pleasingly sung by Miss Liza Lehmann. Mr. Kellie himself sang "Les Vœux des Amant," by Bendall, "Across the far blue hills, Marie," by Blumenthal, and Pinsuti's duet, "Venezia," with Miss Helen D'Alton. M. Theo. Werner was the solo violinist, and Signor Albanesi was at the pianoforte. Upon the whole the programme was most creditably executed.

Mr. Arthur Friedheim, a pianist of some Continental fame, made his first appearance in England at the Steinway Hall, on the afternoon of Friday, May 18. The programme included Beethoven's sonata in C sharp minor, op. 27, No. 2, Liszt's sonata in B minor, "Au lac de Wallenstadt," and Rhapsodie No. 2, and some morceaux by Chopin.

PROVINCIAL.

BIRMINGHAM.—Mr. D'Oyley Carte again granted special permission to the Amateur Opera Society to produce "Iolanthe," in aid of the Queen's Hospital Improvement Fund. This is the third of Gilbert and Sullivan's charming operas, which has been given within a short period by this competent body of amateurs. The performance on the whole was so excellent, that it is a difficult matter where to draw a line between amateurs and professionals. The honorary conductor and Musical Director, Mr. Cortes Perera, a good musician and violin player of considerable ability, has devoted time and energy, and has done everything in his power in promoting this Amateur Opera Society. With one exception, that of the Queen of the Fairies, which was taken by Miss Madge Stavart, a professional artiste, the entire cast consisted of amateurs. The orchestra, however, included some of the best professional orchestral players we have, and the accompaniments were given with due regard to light and shade, with perfect ensemble and finish. The choruses deserve more than a word of praise They were simply admirable. The part of Phylis (an Arcadian shepherdess) was taken by Mrs. Cortes Perera, who looked and played the part with commendable skill and stage experience. The Lord Chancellor found in the person of Mr. S. Royle Shore, jun., an excellent exponent; his acting, his by-play, and make-up were highly characteristic and effective. The other parts were all well-sustained, and the society merit the sincerest congratulations, and fully deserve the great success they have achieved by a really admirable performance of "Iolanthe." At the Theatre Royal, the burlesque, "Miss Esmeralda," produced by Charles Harris, drew capital houses. Herr Meyer-Lutz conducted, and the cast, including that excellent comic actor, Mr. E. J. Lonnen (Claude Follo), Miss Florence Dysart (Esmeralda), Miss Lillian Price (Fleur de Lis), Mr. George Stone (Corporal Gringoire), was in every way excellent. The dresses, appointments, and scenery, not omitting the charming ladies who formed the "corps de ballet," were all in all admirable. The mis-en-scène, under Mr. Mecer H. Simpson, the manager, left nothing to be desired.

MANCHESTER, May 21.—A most interesting concert took place at the Gentlemen's Concert Hall, on Thursday evening last The artists were almost exclusively ladies, and one would have been inclined to resent the appearance of the male element, had it been of a less admirable quality than Signor Piatti. Miss Fanny Davies and Miss Mathilde Wurm, appeared as pianists, and Miss Geraldine Morgan, as violinist, while the vocalist of the evening was Miss Liza Lehmann. It is now two or three years since Miss Davies appeared here as a soloist, and on that occasion the accuracy and delicacy of her playing created a most favourable impression. This was both justified and deepened by her performance on Thursday evening. Not only is Miss Davies possessed of a technique that is almost entirely admirable, but, what is of at least equal importance, her interpretations are dictated by a spirit at once refined and musicianly. As might have been expected, Schumann was not unrepresented in the programme, and Miss Davies gave extremely good renderings of his Romanza in D minor, and Canon in A flat. But her greatest success was secured by her performance of Liszt's "Gnomenreigen," in which she combined such precision and fairy lightness, as to make it a most perfect thing. Perhaps this young pianist has not the same amount of power that is possessed by some of the great virtuosi of the day, and perhaps, too, her efforts to acquire this have occasionally a somewhat damaging effect upon her touch. But there can be no question that her playing will always excite the greatest interest; and, on this occasion, the audience left her in no doubt as to the favourable nature of the impression she had created.

Her rendering of Liszt's "Gnomenreigen," elicited a most determined encore, in response to which she played Reinecke's well-known gavotte. Miss Mathilde Wurm is a pianist of considerable merit. Her solos (Chopin's B flat Prelude, and Rubinstein's Staccato Etude), were hardly of a sufficiently extensive nature to allow one to judge fairly of her powers; but she made it evident in Rubinstein's staccata study that at least one important branch of pianoforte technique has been very carefully cultivated by her. Chopin's prelude, which requires the head quite as much as the fingers, hardly pleased us so well. The violinist, Miss Morgan, is a young player of great promise. But she appeared to be suffering from nervousness, and we are willing to hold this responsible for an occasional thinness of tone, and some slight inaccuracies here and there. Of Miss Lehmann's highly artistic singing we have previously spoken. Her most successful efforts were Schumann's lovely "Der Nussbaum," and the old folkslied "Sandinaunchen," and it is difficult to imagine more perfect renderings of either of these songs than those which she gave on Thursday evening. The most interesting of the concerted pieces was Brahm's pianoforte trio in C minor (op. 101), a work which, as far as we could judge from a first hearing, is fully worthy of its earnest composer.

Glasgow, Tuesday, May 15th.—On Tuesday last the International Exhibition, unanimously pronounced to be the finest and largest since that of 1862, was formally opened by H.R.H. the Prince of Wales. H.R.H., accompanied by H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, who stayed overnight at Dalzell House, arrived in the city shortly after eleven, and having driven to the Council Chambers, were presented with an address. They next proceeded to the Lord Provost's (the Hon. Sir James King) house, where luncheon was in readiness. Shortly after two o'clock the procession was re-formed, and, on their arrival at the grand entrance, a feu de joie was given by the 1st L. A. V. from the slopes of the park. Inside the grand entrance the various gentlemen of the executive were presented, and the opening ceremony having been gone through, H.R.H. the Prince of Wales declared the Exhibition open. However, before this the Glasgow Choral Union sang the inaugural ode, "The New Covenant," written and composed for the occasion—words by R. Buchanan, music by Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, Dr. Mackenzie conducting in person. T.R.H. afterwards visited a few of the principal sections. The musical arrangements have been really magnificently managed, nearly all the best military bands having been engaged for the season. For the first fortnight both the string and brass bands of the Royal Artillery (conductor, Cavaliere L. Zavertal), and the band of the Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders (conductor, R. B. Wakelin), have occupied the south and north kiosks respectively. Mr. Joseph Bradley, Mus. Bac. Oxon., during the day gives two organ recitals in the Grand Hall on one of Walker's celebrated organs. The first choral concert will be given on Thursday, 17th inst. by the Pollokshields Lyrical Society. On Monday evening, 7th inst., the Glasgow Society of Musicians entertained Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, Principal R.A.M.; Sir George Grove, Principal, R.C.M.; Mr. W. A. Barrett and Cavaliere L. Zavertal to supper in the Grand Hotel, Mr. Julius Seligmann (President) in the chair. During the evening the President proposed the toasts of "The Guests," to which Sir George Grove and Dr. Mackenzie replied. Some vocal and instrumental music was discoursed during the evening.

THE

WOODSTOCK, ONTARIO, CANADA.

The Karn Organ is a reproduction of the Pipe Organ in miniature, of pre-eminent value as an effective music exponent for the Home.

OUR AIM has not been to see how cheaply an organ can be built, BUT HOW CHEAPLY A FIRST-CLASS ORGAN can be made.

OUR CLAIM is that we are building organs equal to, if not surpassing, all others, at the very lowest reasonable prices.

COMPARISON CHEERFULLY INVITED.

A GUIDE FOR PIANOFORTE STUDENTS
By RIDLEY PRENTICE.
CONTAINS ANALYSES OF WELL-KNOWN PIECES PROGRESSIVELY ARRANGED, ENABLING THE PUPIL TO UNITE A STUDY OF MUSICAL FORM WITH THE ORDINARY PIANOFORTE PRACTICE.

Saturday Review.—"We are far from suggesting that there is any royal road for acquiring technical knowledge, but we are quite certain Mr. Ridley Prentice's road is in every way the pleasantest that has yet been laid before any pianoforte student."

Academy.—"A knowledge of form is imparted in simple and pleasant language. We heartily commend it to all who desire to understand, satisfactorily interpret, and enjoy beautiful music."

Graphic.—"Written with the laudable purpose of helping the pianoforte student to understand and enjoy beautiful music."

School Board Chronicle.—"A useful book for earnest teachers."

Musical Review.—"Mr. Ridley Prentice has newly developed an important though much neglected branch of the teacher's duties."

Monthly Musical Record.—"No more valuable work of the kind is in existence."

Facts and Comments.

Among the guests invited to accompany Mr. Carnegie on his big coaching tour, which has served to help along conversation in fashionable circles during the past week, will be included, not only a chaplain, but a musician, who is also the son of the late well-known musician of New York, Dr. Leopold Damrosch.

The impending revival of "Macbeth" at the Lyceum Theatre will possess a feature of considerable interest for English musicians in the incidental music to this play, which Sir Arthur Sullivan has undertaken to contribute. The composer's predilection for Shakesperean subjects is well-known, dating as it does from the early days of his career, when, with his music to the "Tempest," performed at the Crystal Palace in 1862, he may be said to have placed his foot on the first rung of the ladder of success. It is from such managers as Mr. Henry Irving that attention, not only to the quality, but also to the appropriateness of theatrical music, is fairly to be expected; and though that expectation was in a measure disappointed in the case of "Faust," we may none the less welcome the new departure as "better late than never."

Dr. Hans von Bülow makes his engagements far ahead. Next Spring he is expected in the United States, to commence in April a series of sixteen performances.

The funeral of the late bass singer, Mr. Cronin, which took place at Kensal Green on Tuesday last week, was made the occasion of many marks of respect on the part of his brother professionals, and a large circle of friends; a special choral service being performed by the choirs of the Chapel Royal, St. James's, and St. Paul's Cathedral. An anthem was also sung at the grave, under the direction of Mr. Jekyll, organist of the Chapel Royal.

Madame Marie Roze, after completing a concert tour through England which will occupy her until the end of August, will proceed to America. Next March, the favourite prima-donna will be due in Australia, for the fulfilment of a concert and operatic engagement there.

In Mario Uchard's amusing novel, "Mon Oncle Barbasson," there occurs the following scene: Uncle and nephew pay a visit to the sister of the one and aunt of the other, who rejoices in the possession of a barrel-organ which plays four of Haydn's Symphonies. After dinner she delights them with some music in the drawing room:—

> "She plays very well, doesn't she?" my uncle quietly remarked.
> "Oh, she plays perfectly," I rejoined, without stinting my praise.
> "And, besides, she puts expression into it," he resumed; "one can see that she feels what she plays."
> My aunt kissed him for this compliment. "Ah, you are still a flatterer!" she said to him. . . . It was really a perfect concert till midnight. But by that time my aunt's plump arm was somewhat tired.

Mutatis mutandis, this fable might be told of many a critic.

In his essay on Art, Emerson says: "Painting seems to be to the eye what dancing is to the limbs. When that has educated the frame to self-possession, to nimbleness, to grace, the steps of the dancing-master are better forgotten." The lesson here taught applies to young musicians, who should ponder it well. Their "dancing-master" is the so-called classical form. When that has been thoroughly absorbed into the system, when it has cleared the mind and the ear from crudeness, and attuned it to the subtler beauties of polyphony, it has served its purpose, and should be laid aside. What we mean is, that the student should learn to write a perfect fugue, and then take a solemn vow never to write one.

The Japanese are in search of a religion, and Professor Toyama, of the Imperial University, strongly advocates the claims of Christianity. He holds that Chinese ethics must be replaced by Christian ethics, and that amongst the benefits to be derived from the introduction of Christianity is, first and foremost, the "improvement in music." Whether western music is better than Chinese music, is, of course, a matter of taste; but it is a curious phenomenon to see the adoption of a new religious system advocated for the purpose of advancing an art which, in some Christian countries we could name, is looked upon with anything but unalloyed favour by religious people. The Church of England and the Church of Rome have often made the Divine art serve religious ends. But here the process is reversed.

"Le Baiser de Suzon," an operetta in one act, words by Pierre Barbier, music by Hermann Bemberg, is the latest novelty at the Opéra Comique in Paris. The libretto runs on familiar lines. Suzon, the village belle, has been betrothed by her father to a rich yokel, while her heart has been given to the handsome Jacques. Needless to add that true love, assisted by Suzon's old nurse, wins the day, and that the wedding bells are heard as the curtain drops. M. Bemberg's music is graceful and pretty, and recalls the forms of the earlier French vaudevilles, of which Rousseau's "Le Devin du Village" is the most perfect specimen, and which, although somewhat primitive, is, at any rate, infinitely preferable to the vulgarities of Offenbach's imitators. Mdlle. Auguez, Mdlle. Pierron, MM. Bernaert, Galand, and Barnolt act the principal parts.

We have to acknowledge the first number of a new periodical, published at Glasgow and Edinburgh, and entitled the "Scottish Art Review: a monthly journal of the Fine Arts, Music, and Literature." Professor Nichol is the mainstay of the literary part, and the musical articles, which more especially concern us, are judiciously written. As an evidence of independent literary effort in the provinces, the "Scottish Review" is especially welcome. If we have any fear in connection with it, it is that it may prove too good to last.

Emile Zola is the name of a new Italian tenor, who has made a success at Bologna. Let us hope that the old proverb, nomen et omen, will not, in this instance, be verified. Naturalism of the pornographic sort would not show to advantage on the operatic stage.

An accident, which might have caused a serious panic, happened lately at the Berlin Opera. In the last act of "Faust," the steam-engine which was used to raise Marguerite heavenwards, suddenly emitted a dense cloud of smoke. The singers and the members of the orchestra were seized with alarm, and began to rush from the stage, and the audience commenced to follow their example. The firemen, however, came forward, and attempted to allay the fear, assuring the crowd that there was no danger. After a few minutes, the performance was proceeded with, though a number of the audience refused to return.

"In spite of all reports to the contrary," says the New York Times, "Signor Campanini's season of operatic concerts was extraordinarily successful. In 80 concerts the receipts were more than 80,000 dollars. At the last concert given in Philadelphia the house counted up 3,200 dollars. At the recent Sunday evening concert at the Broadway Theatre the receipts were 1,270 dollars. For the eight performances of "Otello," at the Academy of Music, they were 23,000 dollars." Signor Campanini, of course, will continue his operatic concerts, a form of art which, even in this benighted country, is beginning to be voted an unqualified nuisance, but which Cousin Jonathan evidently still relishes with all the voracity of a youthful appetite.

"The Real Little Lord Fauntleroy" was played at Mrs. Nye Chart's theatre, at Brighton, for the second time yesterday (Thursday), when Mrs. Oscar Beringer took Miss Vera and the rest of her company down.

While we are waiting for the new opera which is promised at the Savoy in the early autumn, it is not difficult to content ourselves for a while with "The Mikado," which has been now revived, in place of "The Pirates of Penzance." Despite two changes in the cast, not altogether for the better, the opera has lost none of its freshness and piquant humour, although the craze it satirised has to some extent abated. The haughty magnificence of Pooh-Bah, and the inimitable fun of Mr. Grossmith's Ko-Ko are as attractive as ever, and there seems little doubt that "The Mikado" will hold unlessened sway over his numerous kingdom until he is deposed by the hero of the new opera.

Three representations of the "Electra" of Sophocles, will be given in the original Greek, by the students of Cheltenham College, on the 28th, 29th, and 30th of this month. Music to the play has been written by Dr. A. E. Dyer, and will be performed by a full orchestra, and the usual Greek chorus of 15 voices, stengthened and enforced at certain points by a supplementary unseen chorus.

Messrs. Maver and Son, Glasgow, recently sent to Mr. Gladstone copies of their "Genuine Scottish Melodies" and "Irish Melodies and Songs," and have received the following reply: "Allow me to offer my best thanks for the interesting gift you have been kind enough to send me. Like my friend Mr. Blackie, I attach great importance and value both to the cultivation of music in general and to the preservation of that which is national.—W. E. Gladstone." Does this mean that Mr. Gladstone, should he ever return to power, will do something substantial for the divine art? If so, THE MUSICAL WORLD would swallow a good slice of Home Rule for the sake of the benefit that might accrue to the musical world. But we fear not. In musical mattters Tories and Radicals and Liberal Unionists show the same front of stolid indifference.

We have received from Mr. J. W. Lomas, of Yeovil, a sample of a new adhesive vellum tape, which is designed to supply a simple and efficient method of binding sheet-music. The article in question seems admirably adapted for its purpose, and will probably be welcomed by all who suffer from the very real nuisance entailed by torn music.

Mr. J. F. Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" is to be performed on Monday next at the Oxford Commemoration.

The first performance in Italy of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" was given at Bologna, where, it will be remembered, the Italian "Lohengrin" also saw the light. Many prominent musicians and critics were present, and the occasion was generally felt to be one of the first importance. Signor Martucci was the conductor, and amongst the performers Signora Cattane and Signor Louvelli are prominently and favourably mentioned.

We regret to record the death of Mrs. Balfe, widow of the composer, Michael Balte, on the 8th inst., at the age of eighty. Mrs. Balfe, whose maiden name was Lina Rosen, was a Hungarian operatic singer, in which capacity she achieved no small success. She married Mr. Balfe in 1830, and at intervals after her marriage continued to appear on the operatic stage, chiefly in her husband's works; and her impersonation of the leading rôle in "Keolanthe" was a memorable performance. The funeral took place at Kensal Green on Thursday, when a large number of those well-known in the musical world assembled to bear testimony to the esteem in which the deceased lady was held.

BENSON, ABBEY, AND MDME. PATTI.

The New York Herald gives the following details of Benson's latest fraud. This most ingenious rogue has certainly struck out a wholly new line in swindling. Operatic managers are not usually regarded as likely game for the guileful, but Mr. Abbey, the well-known impresario, was certainly, in this instance, duped in a wonderfully neat and complete way:—

In November, 1886, under Mr. Abbey's management, a number of operas, in which Patti, Nicolini, and Scalchi appeared, were produced in this city, and a tour was arranged for December and January, which included, among other places, the City of Mexico. In anticipation of his visit to Mexico, Mr. Abbey engaged the "Teatro Nacionale" for one month from December 15th, 1886, to January 15th, 1887. Mr. Pablo S. Berges, one of the proprietors of the theatre, was paid the sum of £100 on account, and was advised at the same time that Marcus R. Mayer, Mr. Abbey's general business manager and advance agent, would precede Mr. Abbey to the City of Mexico for the purpose of attending to all the business incident to the giving of the operas. These arrangements having been made, it is said that in the month of November, 1886, and while Messrs. Abbey and Mayer were still in the City of New York, Benson, under the assumed name of Charles Bonston, called upon Mr. Berges and personated Mr. Mayer. He was enabled to do this by having performed the following ruse:—

One day early in November, 1886, a well-dressed man, having the carriage and address of a gentleman, called upon Mr. Mayer at Mr. Abbey's office, No. 1,254, Broadway. Mr. Mayer was at the time arranging a reception to be given to Mr. Abbey and Mdme. Patti on their arrival from Europe. The visitor handed Mr. Mayer a neatly lithographed card bearing the inscription "Charles Bonston, correspondent of the Paris Figaro, Gil Blas, London Referee," and stated that he had arrived in this city from Europe but a few days previous on the steamer La Champagne. He desired to interview Mr. Mayer for the Figaro, about Mdme. Patti's journey through this country. He was very suave in his manner, and Mr. Mayer, believing him to be a European correspondent, gave him a prolonged account of the proposed movements of Mdme. Patti in this country and Mexico. He told him about having engaged the Teatro Nacionale, and the dates Patti would sing there, also the prices of admission that would be charged. Mr. Mayer was then asked by the interviewer to explain the modus operandi of advance sales as conducted in New York and Mexico, and this Mr. Mayer explained in detail. A few days after this meeting, Bonston, otherwise Benson, again called on Mayer at the same address and asked for an invitation to the Patti reception and also an invitation to go down the bay to meet Mr. Abbey and Mdme. Patti, as he desired to cable a full account to the Figaro. Mr. Mayer had by this time become suspicious of his visitor and declined to give the invitations sought.

On the morning of November 14, 1886, Mr. Mayer, with a party of friends and reporters, boarded a steamer at the foot of West Twenty-second-street for the purpose of proceeding down the bay to meet the impresario and prima donna. Walking arm in arm with Mr. Mayer was a Herald reporter, and they were present in deep conversation, when who should present himself but Benson, who, addressing Mayer said, "I want to have a long talk with you some time, because I want to send a full account of your doings over to my papers." "Very well, I will see you to-morrow," was the answer. The steamer presently got alongside of the big Cunarder, Umbria, and before the Custom House officer, who had the right to go aboard first, had thought of the fact, the nimble Benson was on its deck. The captain then, for some reason—which served Benson admirably—ordered the Mayer party to go around on the other side of his vessel, which took half an hour. They then got aboard and at length met Mdme. Patti, Scalchi, and Nicolini, and in an animated conversation with Patti was the irresistible

Benson. They conversed in French, and Mr. Mayer was fairly nonplussed when he saw his interviewer of the day before gallantly conduct the great songstress on board the steamer lying in wait for its precious burden.

Soon after the party had got safely aboard, Benson went to Mayer and asked to be introduced to Mr. Abbey, and was told that he would be introduced by-and-bye. Mr. Mayer then introduced the several members of the press to Mdme. Patti, after which, on turning around, he saw that the inimitable Benson had captured Mr. Abbey, and, to use Mayer's own words, "He was laying down the law to him, and interviewing very strong." Mr. Abbey was favourably impressed with Benson, and sent him tickets for the first night of the opera. Mr. Mayer openly expressed his disfavour of the man, and did not wish Benson to have the tickets. On the night of the performance, intending to watch Benson's movements, Mayer was much surprised at not seeing him in the seats allotted him. Presently he went to the back of the stage and came near having a fit when he discovered behind the scenes his bête noire, Mr. "Jingle" Benson, talking to the artists. He spoke to some in French, but to the husband of Scalchi, Count Lolli, he held forth in Italian.

Having thus made himself thoroughly familiar with Mr. Abbey's plans and with Mr. Mayer's methods and duties, Benson left New York and arrived at Aguas Calientes, in the Republic of Mexico, on November 26th, 1886. From this place, under the name of "Mayer," he telegraphed to Mr. Berges, advising him that he would be at his house the next morning. On November 29th he arrived in the City of Mexico, called on Mr. Berges, and represented himself to be Marcus R. Mayer, the business agent of Henry E. Abbey, duly authorised by him to attend to the business incident to the entertainments to be given in Mexico. In company with Mr. Berges, and having first inquired of him where it was customary to have the printing done, he visited the printing house of "Gran Libro" and ordered handbills, prospectuses, and tickets to be printed for the proposed operas.

From the printers Benson, accompanied by Mr. Berges, went to call on Mr. Eduardo Orrin, who is Mr. Berges' partner. Mr. Orrin was personally acquainted with the real Mayer, and showed signs of surprise upon seeing Benson; his suspicions, however, were quickly allayed when Benson, in an easy manner, stated that he was Mayer's brother, and that Marcus R. Mayer would arrive shortly. The sale of tickets was opened on December 1st, 1886, and during this and the following day Benson sold a large number of tickets to various persons residing in the City of Mexico, realising therefrom the handsome sum of 24,654 dols. 50 c.

By this time the suspicions of the Mexican authorities became aroused, and on the night of December 2 Benson was ordered to deposit the proceeds of the sale of tickets with the superintendant of the Hotel Yturbide. But, although Benson was closely watched, he contrived by some cunning means to place in the bags given him for the purpose only the sum of 4,334 dols. 50 c. and having sealed these and deposited them as required he fled from the city of Mexico, carrying the balance with him.

At noon on January 12, 1888, Manager Henry E. Abbey was summoned to police head-quarters, and upon his arrival there was confronted with a stylishly dressed man of about forty-five years of age, of dark complexion, medium height, and slight build, and of a generally rakish appearance. "That's the man!" exclaimed Mr. Abbey the moment he saw him. The man was Harry Benson.

RECENT FESTIVALS,

The London Gregorian Choral Association held their 16th Annual Festival Service at St. Paul's Cathedral, last week. The Association has set itself the commendable aim of furthering the study of the plain song of the ancient church, and setting by its side modern compositions of the same character. The service included, as processionals, the "Ein' Feste Burg," and Bishop Jenner's "For thee, O dear, dear country," the XCVI. and CII. Psalms, adapted by Mr. A. H. Brown, from the Namur Vesperale, and a new anthem, by Dr. Warwick Jordan, "Come unto Me, ye weary." The chorus was not without blemish, almost inevitable at such a performance, but, on the whole, merits considerable praise.

Bristol.—The completion of Bristol Cathedral is being celebrated by two musical services, the first of which took place recently. The Dean has lately addressed a letter to the Bishop of the diocese, in which he relates, in detail, the additions and improvements which have been made within the last thirty-eight years. Since then, upwards of £77,000 have been spent, and this sum, in addition to the private gifts of coloured windows, font, and other internal and external decorations, has sufficed to transform what was an inconvenient and somewhat undignified structure into a place of worship in every way worthy of its purpose. No more fitting way of celebrating this achievement could possibly be found than that which is being adopted. The musical festival in question was given by a chorus of 600 voices under the conductorship of Mr. George Riseley, the cathedral organist, and the most important feature of the service was the performance of "Israel in Egypt." The soloists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Harper Kearton, Mr. Montagu Warlock, and Mr. W. Thomas. The choral work was throughout excellent, the tenors and basses being especially good. The names of the soloists are sufficient guarantee for the quality of their work.

Peterborough.—That the western cathedral cities are not alone in musical enterprise is shown by the triennial festivals which have been held at Peterborough Cathedral by the choirs of Lincoln and Peterborough combined. The latest of these took place last week, and although no novelties were produced, and the performances were limited to two, the festival was one of considerable interest. Works such as "St. Paul," the "Lobgesang," and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" need no detailed comment further than the statement of the general efficiency of the performance. Miss Anna Williams, Miss Lena Little, Mdlle. Seigers, and Mrs. J. Stott, Mr. Charles Banks, Mr. Dunkerton, and Mr. Grice were the principal vocalists, and Dr. Haydn Keeton conducted. After such a performance, it is not too much to hope that the committee may be encouraged to more extended operations, and to the organisation of festivals which shall be of wider scope and interest.

Reviews.

BOOKS.

Notwithstanding the already abundant supply of works, large and small, designed to popularise the study of musical history in this country, a recent addition to their list, supplied by Mr. James E. Matthew, in his (*) "Popular History of Music, from St. Ambrose to Mozart," contains, besides unmistakable evidence of much painstaking industry in the collection and systematic arrangement of facts, certain unique features likely to ensure for it a ready reception in the library alike of the musical student and of the general reader. The survey undertaken in this book of 300 pages of so vast a subject, each branch of which has had its special exponent in long and elaborate treatises, is necessarily and confessedly a rapid one. Many names which will not fail to be associated in the minds of readers of culture with bulky volumes of biographical research, have to be dismissed with little more than bare mention. Critical epochs and important events which have left their indelible traces in the history of musical art are often touched upon with a light, but, at the same time, as one cannot help feeling, with a conscientious hand. In spite of such limitations, Mr. Matthew has contrived to compress within a comparatively small compass a goodly array of information, rendered especially attractive in this case by a pleasant way he has of continually enlivening his text by the prompt production of some appropriate illustration in the shape of drawings of ancient musical instruments, curious facsimiles of musical typography, or admirably-executed portraits. Turning over these liberally-embellished pages, the reader has a sense of enjoyment such as one is apt to experience while visiting some well-stored museum under the guidance of an expert cicerone, who is always ready, as occasion arises, to lay his hand upon whatever curious relic or rare manuscript is needed for an object lesson, and who is well versed in the art of enhancing the interest of his talk by his examples, and of his examples by his talk. He discourses upon the earliest forms of the pneumatic organ: forthwith we have one highly interesting drawing of sculpture in the museum at Arles, and another taken from an obelisk erected by Theodosius at Constantinople, in the fourth century. He passes to the subject of obsolete stringed instruments; a lavish supply of pictorial illustrations, including portions of some curious bas-reliefs, is ready to hand in aid of his descriptions. The earliest attempts at musical notation are simply exemplified by an admirable facsimile, amongst others, from the St. Gregory Antiphonarium (A.D. 790); in presenting which, the author does not forget to recount the singular circumstances through which, later on, this precious relic came to be included among the most cherished possessions of the monastery of St. Gall, in Switzerland. These "neums," as every musician knows, were marks placed above the words, to indicate by their distance from them, the rising and falling of the voice. By many, they have been regarded as merely a guide to singers who already knew the melodies by heart, not, therefore, as professing to define musical intervals with any degree of precision. In support of this view, Mr. Matthew has appositely cited the evidence of St. Isidore, Bishop of Seville, in whose contemporary writings the following sentence occurs: "Unless sounds are retained in the memory, they perish; for they cannot be written down." Later on, however, as is well-known, these primitive signs became the basis of a system of lines and shapes, which, after undergoing various changes, developed into the form familiar to modern music. "It occurred to some scribe," whose name has unfortunately not come down to us—for, without doubt, he deserves to be remembered with gratitude—to draw, with his bodkin, a line across the parchment above the words to which the music was to be given. At the beginning of this line was written the letter F, signifying that all the neums placed upon the line represented the note of that name. At once we have a definite pitch to start from, and the germ of the musical staff, which soon suggested itself. The strange preference apparently given in the earliest attempts at harmony to the very sequences which are found most excruciating to cultivated ears, is exemplified in a specimen of ninth century diaphony. We have said "apparently" because there has always seemed to us much reasonableness in the suggestion that these fourths or fifths, though written one above the other, may, after all, not have been intended to be sung together, but in alternation or response. "This,' says Sir George Macfarren, "is but conjecture, whose proof must rest with the antiquary, but it is based on the natural rule of reason that progressions which are now in the highest degree offensive to the ear, can never have been habitually performed or authoritatively sanctioned."

* "A popular History of Music, Musical Instruments, Ballet and Opera from St. Ambrose to Mozart," by James E. Matthew; H. Grevel & Co.

The chapter on the history of musical instruments will have no small interest and value for those who are not in possession of the larger works devoted to the subject—notably the sumptuous volume lately contributed by Mr. Hipkins. The series of illustrations, derived from various sources familiar to antiquarians, and to many general readers, through Mr. C. Engel's excellent catalogue of the musical instruments at the South Kensington Museum, constitutes one of the specially attractive features of the present work.

Passing from one country to another, as each in its turn became, for the time being, the prominent factor in the development of musical art, chapters are alternatively devoted to the musical influence of the Netherlands down to the time of Orlando de Lassus, after whose death that influence gradually ceased, and to the subsequent progress of music in Italy, Germany, and England. It is, perhaps, to be regretted that space could not have been found for a rather more extended notice of the Flemish School—the account given of this important part of the subject being restricted to less than a dozen pages—even though it had been necessary for the purpose to curtail some of the details connected with English music, already made familiar by the well-known works of Sir Edward Hawkins and Dr. Burney, and by the countless smaller histories that have been founded upon them. The chapters devoted to the rise of opera in France, and also to the music of that country during the eighteenth century are very excellent, and contain, as usual, several highly interesting pictorial scraps, reproductions of celebrated paintings, theatrical sketches, and quaint old play bills. The examples of choreagraphic notation, in the last chapter, in which the intricacies of the ballet have been reduced to various written signs, will prove both novel and bewildering to the uninitiated. But we are unable here to follow the author in further detail, and must content ourselves with the acknowledgment that closely as he has brought his facts together, he has done so in a style that is never tedious; and that, while of course laying under contribution many standard works, he has evidently also read and sought on his own account, the result being a compendious and attractive volume, equally worthy of a place in the bookcase, and on the drawing-room table.

Messrs. Ricordi send a short biographical sketch, by Cesare Lisei, entitled *"Jenny Lind," in which the leading events of one of the most remarkable of artistic careers have been set forth with evident knowledge of the subject, and in a very graceful, sympathetic style. This eminently readable little pamphlet may be further recommended to the attention of amateurs acquainted with the Italian language, as containing various facts not to be found in the ordinary obituary notices.

The supply of new manuals of Musical Theory seems just now to be more than usually abundant. A little work entitled †"Harmony Lessons," by Charles A. Trew, proves on examination to be a good specimen of this class. Written in the useful form of question and answer, the information here set forth is all that is required as a preparation for the study of larger works; and, indeed, is sufficient in itself to imbue any pupil who shall thoroughly digest its contents with a very fair general view of the subject. Its uses to the teacher, in presenting him with concise, ready-made definitions and rules which would cost him no small trouble to formulate for himself, are too obvious to need enlarging upon; and the exercises given at the end of each section will prove a further recommendation in this respect.

The Organ World.

ORGAN RENDERING OF ORCHESTRAL ACCOMPANIMENTS.

I.

At the request of an esteemed correspondent and member of the College of Organists, this subject, one of growing importance, is approached with a full sense of many difficulties, caused by a want of perspecuity inevitable in dealing with a topic demanding numerous practical illustrations, and by differences calling for purely local treatment as regards size and character of instrument, nature of choir, position of organ, etc. There is, of course, no getting over the fact that the organist must be, from the varying exigencies of his profession, an artist of ready resources, experienced judgment, and marked decision of character. Such a skilled specialist naturally requires no attempted definite suggestions regarding the practice of his art, and his interest in a subject of such wide scope and varied points of divergence as that indicated by the title, "Organ rendering of orchestral accompaniments," must be confined to the consideration of generalities. Although in the interests of art, it is important that the organ be regarded as a classical instrument with its own musical literature; it is also important that the unique position of the instrument as the most complete and comprehensive medium of adaptation be duly regarded. In no direction are the powers of the organ as an instrument of adaptation more largely or honourably exercised than in the organic treatment of the orchestral scores of the cantatas, oratorios, and other grand choral works of the great composers. Again, in no country has this art of adaptation been so extensively and, one may add, successfully practised up to the present time as in England. For reasons just given, as showing the manifold difficulties surrounding the consideration of the subject, it would seem all but impossible to reduce this science of organic orchestral representation to arrangements on paper. Such adaptation may be spoken of as a ready method of musical sketching. The term does not imply careless, rough work, but it means the power of representing in a sufficient, but confessedly more or less incomplete and often necessarily unsatisfactory manner, suggested rather than realised effects. It deals with the imperfections as well as with the cultivated powers of the human mind, inasmuch as it pre-supposes the possibility of detail being in some cases overlooked or forgotten; all the same, it is not the art of deception, but distinctly the faculty of suggestion. The subject divides itself into sections, as the organic representation of an entire score, or the filling up of the musical picture by a more partial representation as of the wind instruments when stringed instruments are being employed with the organ, or a reduction of string and wood wind effects when—as is the fashion nowadays—brass instruments are employed to give accent and power to the organ itself. And, perhaps, the subject viewed completely embraces also the use of the organ with the orchestra in the performance of its own special and individual orchestral duties.

THE COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS' EXAMINATION.

As the time is approaching when the Midsummer Examinations take place (July 17, 18, 19, for Fellowship, and 24, 25, and 26, for Associateship), the following quotations from a paper read by Mr. E. M. Bowman, an American organist and a graduate of the College, will not be out of place. In addressing the United Music Teachers' National Association, during their session at Providence, that gentleman urged the foundation of examinations upon the system adopted and perfected by the College of Organists in England. In the course of his remarks, Mr. Bowman observed :—

The examination for both these degrees should be conducted on the plan adopted by the London College of Organists, namely, partly written and partly demonstrative. The candidate, as at the College of organists, should remain strictly incognito to the Board, so that the examination should be entirely impartial, and the degree, if won at all, won on the basis of merit. The examination should cover work not only in the direct practice of teaching the branch selected, but also, to a certain extent, in the theory and history of music, science of acoustics, and general musical information, the difference in the degrees of Associate and Fellow being made to express a difference in the scope of the examination, and not a distinctisn in the character thereof. While there would be no special necessity of this superior degree of Fellow, its office of stimulating effort to press onward to still higher attainments than would be called for by his associateship degree would certainly result in a corresponding elevation of the professional standard. Thus, the examination for Associateship should cover all necessary qualifications for an entrance upon the practice of teaching, while that for fellowship should be exacting enough to express advanced attainments in the selected branch, and form, indeed, an honour to be coveted by the ablest musicians. The degree of Fellow would constitute the honour par excellence of the National College of Teachers, and the Board of Examiners should be empowered, at their discretion, to waive examination and confer the degree of Honorary Fellow upon such teachers as may have already proven, by long and distinguished services to the profession, that they merit such a distinction. In all other cases it might be considered desirable that the degree of Associate should be acquired by all prior to that of Fellow; or, in other words, to become eligible to the degree of Fellow one should first become an Associate.

This is now the practice at the London College of Organists, a bye-law to that effect having been adopted in 1881, and it has already proven a salutary measure in causing increased respect for the degree of Associate.

The proposals foreshadowed by the speaker were duly discussed and carried out, and examinations are held from time to time by the American College and its highly efficient Board of Examiners. In Mr. Bowman's paper he described the modus operandi of the College of Organists. His paper was entitled "The System of Examination adopted by the College of Organists," by President E. M. Bowman :—

Having already given in my address of the morning an exposition of my views concerning the desirability of extending to all branches of the musical profession the system of examinations adopted by the London College of Organists, the question which I have been requested by the Executive Committee to introduce, I propose now, in accordance with their desire, to give you a brief description of what the college and its system of examinations consists, to the end that we may discuss our question more understandingly.

The College of Organists was established in 1864, and the purposes of its foundation, according to the memorandum of the association, were :—

1. "To provide a central organization in London for the profession of organist."
2. "To provide a system of examinations and certificates for the better definition and protection of the profession, and to secure competent organists for the service of the church."
3. "To provide opportunities for intercourse among members of the profession, and the discussion of professional topics."
4. "To encourage the composition and study of sacred music."
5. "To do all such lawful things as are incidental to the attainment of the above objects."

In the articles of association it was declared:

"The college shall consist of a president, vice-president, musical examiners, honorary treasurer, honorary librarian, honorary auditors (2), fellows, associates, honorary members, and ordinary members. Furthermore, that the government of the college shall be vested in a council consisting of twenty-one Fellows."

To show that the most eminent men of England not only founded the College of Organists, but have stuck to it for over twenty years, long enough to test the question of the desirability, popularity, and permanency of such an institution, let me give you some of the names of the original and of the latest officiary. (These were given.)

Now let us take a glance at one of these examinations. The candidates for the certificates of the college, having sent in their names to Secretary Turpin a few days beforehand, assemble, on the day appointed, at the college building, where they first pay the examination fee of two guineas, or ten dollars, to the treasurer, M. E. Wesley, Esq., who, by the way, is a son of "Old Sam Wesley," as the famous organist and composer is familiarly called.

They then draw their numbers, by which alone they are to be known to the Board of Examiners.

These preliminaries over, the candidates are handed the first half of their examination paper, that part entitled "Paper-work away from the organ," and seated around the tables supplied with stationery, etc., they set to work to solve the enigmas propounded by the rather formidable-looking paper. Silence reigns, unbroken, save by the nervous scratch of busy pens.

The other half of his examination paper is entitled "Paper-work at the organ." This is arranged to present to him an epitome of the work of a cathedral organist.

Bear in mind that all this "Paper-work at the organ" is to be solved at sight. The candidate, through the assiduous, kindly attention of the gentleman near at hand, is not allowed time to look over anything, or to consider for a minute what he is going to do.

During this time the examiners are "sizing him up" according to a prearranged scale of averages on each feature of the examination.

The average arrived at by adding their total credits together constitutes the candidates' rating as practical organists.

With regard to "Paper-work away from the organ," the candidate signs his number to it and sends it to the examiners of the "Paper-work away from the organ."

Each of the examiners in this department now goes over this work separately, and rates it as he sees fit. The average is then struck and this rating is again averaged with that of the organ examiners, and the final result determines whether the candidate has lost or won. At the conclusion of the examination the secretary inquires the numbers drawn by the various candidates, and enters their names opposite these numbers. Then, for the first time, the Board of Examiners discover the identity of the candidates, and even then, only the names of successful candidates are disclosed. It will be seen that the examiners and candidates do not come into personal contact at all, and there is no chance whatever for collusion or deception.

In the earlier years of the college these examinations were less exacting, and the very fact of their having grown more and more severe attests the growth and influence of the institution. It is steadily elevating in Great Britain the standard of that branch of our profession. A glance at the statistics reveals the same fact.

This shows the eagerness of organists to secure the indorsement of the college; and this eagerness is largely a reflection of the value which is placed upon this indorsement by the public; indeed, it is becoming almost necessary in England for organists either to possess a College of Organists degree or to be so great as not to need it.

Now to show just how impartial and severe these examinations were, it is only necessary to state that only an average of ten to fifteen per cent. are successful.

Since the distinguished American organist read his paper, one or two changes of detail have been necessitated by the largely-increased number of candidates, such as the assignment of the paper work to one day, and the distribution of the organ-playing over two succeeding days, together with a few small changes, by which the examiners, now 12 in number, are enabled to cope with their work without interference with the general principles of the examination scheme, and without calling upon the candidates to make any larger sacrifice of time and labour. The elaborate and carefully-thought-out machinery of the College examinations continue to move with the same expedition as formerly. Indeed, the accuracy and completeness of the different departments alike gain under the new arrangements. It may be well to add that the examination work of the American College, and the success of the Music Teachers' National Association, have already done much in the States to advance the interests of the art and its professors. This year the meeting of the Association takes place at Chicago, and the performance of a cantata, by Dr. Hiles, of Manchester, is a feature of its programme.

THE ORGAN AND THE CLASSICS.

A Lecture given by FRANK J. SAWYER, D. Mus. Oxon., F.C.O.

In the Athenæum, September 23rd, after an interesting account of the first performance of "St. Paul" in London, when Mendelssohn sat in the gallery and listened and wrote in his journal that he found it "very interesting," we read:—"In the morning we had the rare pleasure of hearing Mr. Mendelssohn, on the organ at Christ Church, Newgate-street. Here, beside several extemporaneous pieces, he played Sebastian Bach's Prelude and Fugue in A minor, and a Toccata in D minor by the same author, concluding with a magnificent Fugue (extempore) on a subject furnished by Mr. S. Wesley. The masterly way in which Mr. Mendelssohn treated this theme not only evinced his perfect command of the utmost resources of the art, but proved him to possess a mind of the highest order."

The following number of the Athenæum tells us that "on leaving the Birmingham Town Hall on the Friday morning, after his last organ performance of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E flat, even the people assembled within the building cheered him. We like to record such things as a sign that the nation is not grown dull and cold-hearted."

The previous day, at the Birmingham Festival, he had extemporised on "Your harps and cymbals" (Solomon), and the first movement of Mozart's Symphony in D, both of which had been performed that day.

On September 8th, 1840, Mendelssohn was again in London, "that smoky nest, my favourite residence," he calls it, and on to Birmingham, where he played on Tuesday, the 22nd. In the Athenæum we read (September 26th), "We must not forget Dr. Mendelssohn's organ performances, as another feature of the festival. Critics, with nicer balances than ourselves, shall declare whether or not they are better of their kind than his treatment of the pianoforte, both being, to our judgment, of the highest order, devoid of the slightest admixture of concession to the taste of the hour, and yet how forcible and how animating."

September 30th, saw him back in London, and playing at St. Peter's, Cornhill, Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, his own in C minor, and another in F minor, which has not yet seen the light of publication, concluding all with Bach's "Passacaglia."

The Athenæum for October 3rd contains the following:—"By way of supplement to our notice of the Birmingham Festival, we may mention that the receipts of that meeting were greater than on any previous occasion—the expenses a trifle less. The Londoners have enjoyed, to speak fancifully, an appendix to one of its finest chapters, in the organ playing of Dr. Mendelssohn, during the past week. We have heard nothing on the instrument comparable to his performance on Tuesday at Christ Church, Newgate Street. Amongst other notable things he played a Passacaglia and Fugue by Sebastian Bach, a Pastorale and Fugue, we believe his own composition, besides sundry displays of extempore power; in the last combining the themes of the first and last choruses of Handel's "Israel," with an ease, science, variety, and brilliancy not to be forgotten."

For two years we lose sight of Mendelssohn as an organist until, in June, 1842, we find him once more in London.

On the 12th of the month he is again at St. Peter's, Cornhill.

It was Sunday, Sir George Grove tells us in his Dictionary of Music and Musicians, and as Mendelssohn came into the church, the congregation were singing a hymn to Haydn's well-known tune. This he took for the subject of his voluntary, and varied and treated it for some time extempore in the happiest and most scientific manner. On the 16th, he paid a visit to Christ Church, Newgate Street, and it was possibly on that occasion that he played an extempore fantasia on "Israel in Egypt," which positively electrified those who heard it. He also again treated Haydn's Hymn, but, this time, as a fantasia and fugue, entirely distinct from his performance of four days previous. (Grove's Dictionary, article Mendelssohn).

The Athenæum again furnishes us with an interesting description (June 18, 1842): "The chronicle of the week is not complete without some reference to its greatest feature; although, strictly speaking, this may not come under the head of public exhibition. We allude to the organ playing with which Dr. Mendelssohn Bartholdy treated the congregation of St. Peter's, Cornhill, on Sunday; and on Thursday a large audience assembled in Christ Church, Newgate Street. We have only once in three years, or thereabouts (whenever, in short, this distinguished artist visits London), an opportunity of hearing the splendid compositions of Sebastian Bach thus rendered—of witnessing such displays of science, genius, mechanical power combined, as his improvisations. On Sunday, for instance, he took one of the hymns of the service—"God preserve the Emperor"—and wrought it for more than half-an-hour, exhausting every contrivance (so it seemed) of reply, rejoinder, harmonic change, and episodical embellishment; and yet on Thursday, being solicited again to treat the same theme, a fantasia and a fugue resulted so wholly different, save in their consummate variety and skill, as if they had been the work of another organist's feet and hands. But this organ playing in the dog days, and among so dense a crowd of gazers as will throng in the train of our visitor, is a serious matter, Dr. Mendelssohn being compelled on Thursday to shorten his performance from sheer bodily fatigue.

To the Editor of THE ORGAN WORLD.

SIR,—Last week I closed my letter so hastily and abruptly, that I will ask you to allow me now to supply what I then left unsaid, or said incompletely.

The Bill before the House of Lords may be suggesting one of two courses, either of which would certainly tend to bring about the improvement in the direction of the music of the church, which is understood to be the desired object of the promoters of that Bill. It may be, that, recognising the highly cultured powers of the modern professional musician, it embraces a proposal that more discretionary power should be placed in the hands of the thoroughly qualified and duly certified organist. Or, having regard to the comparative amount of musical knowledge possessed in the olden time by the precentor and his musical staff, it may be that it is the desire of the Bishops to provide for the better musical education of precentors, so that their knowledge may once again be raised to at least a level with that possessed by any member of the musical staff whom he may be called upon to direct.

The latter would be obviously the better of the two courses, as precentors would then anew possess the comparative amount of theoretical and practical musical knowledge contemplated by the old statutes. For it ought not to be forgotten, that the precentors of former days were necessarily, to a great extent, the composers of prick-song—written figured music—as well as the directors of it at rehearsal, and its overlookers during performance in service time.

The precentors of the present day are not, as a rule, distinguished as composers of new "figured music"—services and anthems—but they frequently introduce fresh works from the pens of others; and it is when doing so that a precentor has the opportunity of enlightening the members of the choir and the organist by pointing out in what respects the new music is as good or better, if it be so, than the old, which is shelved; and during the subsequent rehearsals, when any passage goes not to his satisfaction, he has again the opportunity of showing how it ought to be done, by singing or playing it better himself. All this is in the true spirit of the times of old, and well becomes the holder of the position of "chief musician." But all this is said by some people, perhaps ill-naturedly, to be just what some precentors do not do.

It was wittily said by a writer some years ago, when speaking of the small support that certain congregations rendered their choirs, that their "contributions" consisted chiefly of their criticism! Similarly it has been said of some precentors, curates, and "inscrutable authorities," that their "official assistance" too frequently consists chiefly of fault-finding. Very different, this, from the knowledge and spirit of the olden times! All this it is doubtless the object of the new Bill to set right; for it is scarcely in accordance with one's unsophisticated notions as to "the fitness of things," that the precentors should be better acquainted with the rules of lawn tennis than of the composition of church music!—Faithfully yours,

May 29th, 1888. J. K.

A SUGGESTION TO ORGANISTS.

To the Editor of THE ORGAN WORLD.

4th June, 1888.

SIR,—I receive from time to time applications for good appointments as Organists and Choirmasters, both in the United Kingdom and in America. Candidates should not only be good organists, but should be qualified to teach the Tonic Sol-fa system.

I have great difficulty in finding men who answer to this double requirement. In America, especially, the Episcopal Church is rapidly gaining ground, and is adopting surpliced choirs, so that the problem of choir-training comes prominently to the front there. May I take this opportunity of urging young organists to study the Tonic Sol-fa system?—I am, yours truly,

J. SPENCER CURWEN.

MUSIC FOR ORGAN WITH OTHER INSTRUMENTS.

To the Editor of THE ORGAN WORLD.

DEAR SIR,—Can any of the readers of your paper inform me of any effective arrangements or compositions for the following instruments, together with names of publishers and prices?—Organ and violin, organ and 'cello, and organ, violin, and 'cello.—Yours sincerely, A. C. O.

[Mozart's Organ Sonatas, Merkel's and G. A. Macfarren's Sonatas for violin and organ, with other works to be found in the catalogues of leading publishers will answer A. C. O.'s purpose.]

SPECIFICATIONS.

BEDFORD.—The organ in the Moravian Church is the oldest of five now existing, known to have been built by Gerhard Schmidt, who came over from Germany, after the Restoration, with his uncle, Bernhard Schmidt, "the Father of English Organ-builders." It was originally constructed for St. Paul's Church, in 1715; but when that edifice was restored in 1832, the instrument was sold to the Moravian Congregation, and, after repair, was put up in the east gallery of the old chapel in St. Peter's. On the erection of the present place of worship, twenty-three years ago, the organ was unwisely crowded into a confined recess, which not only stifled its tone, but, by dampness and want of ventilation, proved very injurious to its mechanism, so that although a considerable sum was spent upon it in 1876, it has again become wholly unfit for use. Some years since—with a view to preserve the organ—an apse, with an extension for the choir, was designed, and is now completed. The opinions of experts—Mr. H. R. Rose, Professor at the Royal Academy of Music, and organist of St. Pancras Church, and Mr. P. H. Diemer, organist of Trinity Church, Bedford, pointed to an entire rebuild, in order to properly preserve the instrument and to fit it for the requirements of modern organ-playing. It has been decided as the proper course to face the question of an entire rebuild on modern principles; and the instrument is now in the hands of Messrs. Brindley and Foster, of Sheffield, who have lately rebuilt the rightly or wrongly so-called "Handel's Organ," a sister one, at Little Stanmore Church, Edgware.

Rondeau in D minor	Rameau.
Fantasia in G	J. S. Bach.

The remaining recital this term was to be given on June 15th, by Mr. G. F. Cobb.

S. MICHAEL'S, BOWES PARK.—A recital, on May 28th, was given by Mr. Stanley Hawley, A.C.O., Sub-professor R.A.M., organist of St. Paul's, Winchmore Hill. His rendering of the following programme gave great pleasure:—

Sonata, No. 1	Mendelssohn.
Cantilène	Salomé.
Intermezzo	Chipp.
Air, "He counteth all your sorrows"	Mendelssohn.
Finale and Fugue in F	Rheinberger.
Fantasia Pastorale	Wély.
Air, "Be thou faithful unto death"	Mendelssohn.
March Funèbre et Chant Séraphique	Guilmant.
Postlude in D	W. G. Wood.

Mr. Faithful Pearce contributed the vocal solos.

PARISH CHURCH, HIGH WYCOMBE.—An organ recital was given by Mr. J. G. Wrigley, Mus. Bac., Oxon, F.C.O., on May 28th.

Fantasia, op. 5	Merkel.
Air Varied, "Holsworthy Church Bells"	Wesley.
Larghetto, Clarinet Quintett	Mozart.
Toccata	Dubois.
Gavotte	Dr. Boyce.
Idylle, "At Evening"	Buck.
"The Better Land"	Cowen.
March, "Eli"	Costa.

Notes.

It is stated that the Queen has consented to the erection of a new instrument to replace the present organ in the Private Chapel of Windsor Castle.

A programme lying before the writer, of the date January 16th, 1826, sets forth that "At the request of several of the parishioners of St. Bride's, Fleet Street, Mr. Mather," a well-known blind organist and composer of his day, "Organist of the Parish, will perform a Selection of Sacred Music on the Organ." With the exception of an Extempore Fantasia—Mr. Mather was a famous extemporaneous performer—there is not a single organ piece on the list; indeed it would have been difficult to play any classical organ music on the old Renatus Harris instrument then in the church. The first part is devoted to Handel; and in the second part the composers' names given are Mather, Haydn, Graun, Pergolesi, Arne, and Beethoven. In accordance with a fashion more prevalent in the days of G organs and limited pedal-boards than now, the "Hallelujah" choruses from the "Messiah" and the "Mount of Olives" are announced to be played by two performers. A few such arrangements still exist in print. Admission was by tickets, to be had of the Churchwardens, for which no charge was made. The programme states that: "Many of the Parishioners, having expressed a wish to recompense Mr. Mather for the several Entertainments he has given them on the organ, they are informed they may attend in the Vestry for that purpose." The programme now being quoted from has been preserved by a gentleman present upon the occasion in question.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS' CALENDAR.

On Tuesday next, June 19th, the library will be opened from 7 to 10. June 26th, Lecture by Dr. C. W. Pearce, on "Some Suggested Modifications of Day's Harmony, to meet the various objections raised against his Theory." Dr. E. J. Hopkins will take the chair. July 17th, 18th, 19th, F.C.O. Examination; July 20th, Diploma Distribution; July 24th, 25th, 26th, A.C.O. Examination; July 27th, Diploma Distribution. Candidates should send in their names, with fees, on or before July 10th. Every information may be obtained on application. Other arrangements and particulars will be duly announced.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JUNE 16, 1888.

VIRTUOSITY AND TEMPERAMENT.

Most of us, at one time or another, have come across pianists—to take, perhaps, one of the commonest examples of a well-known phenomenon—who, while possessing gifts that would seem, in a great measure, to justify their ambition, nevertheless, after a first, and perhaps a last appearance upon a concert platform, have been compelled, by sad experience, to acknowledge themselves deficient in the one rare quality indispensable to the accomplishment of that feat familiarly described as "carrying their audience away with them." Talent, memory, manual dexterity, sympathy with the work on hand, even a dash of other qualities not far removed from what is generally included in the much abused term "genius"—all these in combination, appear at times to be insufficient to avert failure. A certain invisible link between the player and his audience is manifestly wanting, so that, in spite of some undeniable points of merit, the performance falls flat. What then is this subtle something which has to be added to many natural gifts and acquired accomplishments, before the singular power wielded by our few really eminent virtuosos can be arrived at? In any attempt to solve the difficulty, the question of temperament will naturally bear a large part. Of two given natures, each equally sensitive in its way to the magnetism of a large audience, one may be altogether crushed by it—and this of course is the more frequent occurrence—while the other finds in it a source of power and inspiration. The name of Franz Liszt immediately occurs as a conspicuous example of the latter phenomenon. To him the excitement always engendered among a vast assemblage of eager listeners was as a breath of new life. Far from being disconcerted by it, he possessed in a marked degree the power of collecting, and, as it were, throwing it back to them; and it is to this reflex action that the extraordinary influence he was able to exert over large audiences may be fairly ascribed; although, it may be remarked, in passing, that, according to Wagner, Liszt was even more successful when playing before a few chosen friends, than in a concert room. Paganini was another virtuoso, the electric effect of whose performances was evidently phenomonal. Rubinstein, greatly as he impresses his audience, appears himself to be carried along by the tide of music, and plays very much as he may be supposed to play when alone in his room. But in his case also, there seems little reason to doubt that some such process as that hinted at takes place, unconsciously, perhaps, to himself. Mdme. Schumann—and, in a less degree, her pupil, Janotha—generally appears to be too much possessed by the spirit of the composer she interprets, to take much heed of what is going on around her; while Bülow is in the habit of playing at an elevation of at least as many feet above his audience as a preacher is popularly supposed to be above controversy. The performance of Pachmann, on the other hand, has in it a touch of camaraderie, for he continues his way, by turns singing and sparkling on the piano, just as though his audience were an intimate friend, in whose presence he takes pleasure in giving expression to the musical impulse of the moment; and far from being the result of affectation, the facial movements which have sometimes been remarked upon in his case are nothing more than a direct, unpremeditated expression of those impulses.

To return to those less favoured persons who, instead of being elated and stimulated by the collective magnetism of a crowded assembly, are more or less paralysed by it, let it be remembered that their case is not by any means hopeless. The keen sensibility is at any rate proved to be there. Perhaps, when the unfamiliar feeling attendant upon a first public appearance, so overwhelming to certain natures, shall have worn out by custom, what was at first a hindrance may be turned into a motive power. In theatrical circles, among managers, teachers of elocution, and others with special opportunities of forming a judgment upon these matters, there is a very general opinion that nervous débutantes, thanks to the very sensibility which paralyses their efforts at the beginning, are very likely to develope, later on, into artists of some, and possibly high, merit. There is only one class to whom such favoured destiny must ever be denied; those, to wit, who, from first to last, remain utterly insensible to external influences of any kind; who are able to snap their fingers at an audience, however critical, pursuing their way, and doing their work, badly or pretty well, with equal self-content. Many such—and their name is legion—are little the worse, as far as their material prospects are concerned, for this pachydermous condition—a condition which may be regarded as the legitimate protection provided by nature to mediocrity. They often manage to acquire no mean dexterity of execution; their memories and fingers remain unflustered amid surroundings however trying; they will coolly exhibit their second-rate talents, immediately before, immediately after, or (when pushing sufficiently avails them) in conjunction with artists of the highest eminence, unconscious of any contrast, and for the most part sincerely convinced that they are as good, if not better, than the best of them. The very fact that these happily constituted people are always cool and always at their little best, will not fail in time to give their services a certain value; but artists, in any high sense of the word, they can never become.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The performances at Covent Garden during the last week do not call for any detailed comment. On Saturday, "Les Huguenots" was given, with Madame Nordica and M. Jean de Reszke as Valentina and Raoul, who merit a large share of praise. Mdlle. Ella Russell was a sufficiently agreeable Queen, and M. Edouard de Reszke a magnificent San Bris. The rest of the cast included Mdme. Scalchi's well-known interpretation of the part of Urbano, and Signor Puente as Nevers.

"Faust" was again given on Monday night, Mdme. Nordica and the brothers de Reszke retaining their parts, and Mdme. Trebelli taking the rôle of Siebel, and M. Lassalle that of Valentine. We have nothing to add to our previous criticism of the three artists first mentioned, Mdme. Nordica's conception of the unhappy Marguerite being as tender and gracious as ever, while the Polish brothers brought all their accustomed art to the interpretation of the parts of Faust and Mephistopheles. M. Lassalle as Valentine was superb, the death scene being played with magnificent force. It is certainly to be hoped that Mr. Harris will, whenever "Faust" may be next performed, remove what is at present the most important blemish in the stage management, the treatment, that is to say, of the cathedral scene, which is, at present, shorn of much of its spiritual force.

"Rigoletto" was given on Tuesday, with Mdme. Melba in the part of Gilda, and Mdme. Scalchi and M. D'Andrade in their old parts. Mdme. Melba was suffering from hoarseness, but nevertheless gave much of her music with force; her rendering of "Caro Nome," in especial, winning a good deal of applause. M. Guille undertook the rôle of the Duke, which he performed with a fair share of intellegence and earnestness.

"L'Africaine" was made the occasion, on Wednesday evening, of introducing Miss Columbia, an American débutante, who then appeared in the part of Selika. The lady was suffering, not unnaturally, from a severe attack of nervousness, which materially interfered with her efforts, conscientious though these were. It will be time to speak of her claims to rank as a prima donna when she has been heard again. Miss Macintyre again took the part of Inez, and MM. Jean and Edouard de Reszke and Lassalle were as fine as ever in parts with which they have been previously identified.

LETTER FROM OUR SPORTING PROPHET.

To the Editor of The Musical World.

Mr. Editor, Sir,—Before the appearance of this issue, the students of the Royal College and of the Royal Academy of Music will have met in friendly rivalry in a cricket match, announced to take place last Thursday, on the Eton and Middlesex ground. This amiable rapprochement on the cricket-ground of the two representative bodies to which musical England owes much, and hopes in due time to owe much more, in addition to the gratifying suggestion of good-fellowship implied by it, is not wanting otherwise in a certain appropriateness; for was not the God of the Lyre addicted also to sports and games—though more at home, no doubt, with quoits than with bat and wickets? That, at least, was the opinion of the unfortunate youth, Hyacinthus. It will require no great effort of imagination to believe that this meeting of musical athletes will have been celebrated by a number of good "rounds," and no less meritorious "catches," that many a chromatic run will have added brilliancy to the performance, and that a certain staccato style of bowling may be expected to cause some embarrassment to any robust tenor attempting a masculine version of "Batti, Batti." But however plentiful "bawls" may be in the field, I hope these will all be aimed at the stumps, and never at a leg-arter, thereby giving occasion for an andante movement con molto expressione. There will be plenty of rests and pauses over the (refreshment) bars, and if the match eventually results in a tie, the score, as everybody will acknowledge, cannot be in safer hands than those of Sir George Grove and Dr. Mackenzie. With the exception of warning the flats against the sharps, this is all, sir, your sporting contributor is able at present to make out of a coming event which you most unjustifiably commissioned him to write about, before it was possible to witness it.—Yours to command, Presto.

Concerts.

Mr. EDWIN BENDING'S CONCERT.

A fairly numerous audience assembled at the Royal Albert Hall, on Saturday afternoon last, to enjoy the excellent entertainment provided by Mr. Bending, and, to judge from the numerous recalls, all were satisfied. Madame Valleria and Madame Trebelli, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Signor Foli, Madame Norman-Neruda and Madame Sophie Menter, and Signor Bottesini, and Mr. Edward Bending, were each heard to great advantage. We regret that we cannot give a detailed account, as our representative, not caring to support the "book imposition," was unable to obtain a programme. An excellent orchestra and choir assisted, ably conducted by Mr. Bending.

MADAME DE PACHMANN'S RECITAL.

Princes' Hall was on Saturday afternoon the scene of a most interesting recital given by Madame de Pachmann. The accomplished lady appeared on this occasion as a composer as well as a pianist, producing, in conjunction with Mr. Gompertz, a sonata in E minor, for violin and piano. In attempting such a work, a young composer sets himself an ambitious task, and challenges criticism of the closest sort. We are glad to be able to admit that in Madame de Pachmann's case the ambition is justified. The sonata is written in four movements, and shows a strength of grasp and conciseness of thought not often to be met with. The scherzo is very graceful and dainty, and the final movement is wrought out with singular clearness and dignity. Its interpretation was not less excellent. Besides this item, Madame de Pachmann gave refined and sympathetic renderings of other works more or less familiar, including Beethoven's sonata, "Les Adieux, l'absence et la retour," and Chopin's Ballade in G minor.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

The programme of last Monday's concert was, for the most part, made up of items so familiar as to call for little or no comment. Wagner's "Faust" overture, the Trauermarsch from the "Götterdämmerung," and the "Charfreitagszauber" from "Parsifal" are well-known to amateurs, as are also Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody in F, No. 1," and Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, and there is little to be said save that they were played with that perfection to which Herr Richter has accustomed us. Dr. Mackenzie's interesting "Twelfth Night" overture, which we referred to last week on the occasion of its first performance, was repeated by desire, and heartily applauded, while the clever young violinist, Mr. Henri Marteau, fully sustained the great promise he had already shown, and by his performance of Saint-Saën's "Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso in A, op. 28," proved that he can thoroughly identify himself with the French school. Berlioz's "Faust" is announced for the next concert.

DR. HANS VON BULOW'S BEETHOVEN RECITALS.

The second of these concerts took place last Tuesday afternoon, when the cheaper seats were absolutely packed, while the balcony was scarcely half filled, the lesson of which seems to be that too high a price is charged for admission to this part of the hall. In the stalls were many leading musicians, including Sir Charles Hallé, who, as at the first recital, followed the performance with apparently rapt attention. The programme comprised four sonatas: the two of op. 27, and the D minor and E flat major, Nos. 2 and 3 of op. 31; the variations and fugue on a theme from the "Eroica," and the thirty-two variations on an original theme in C minor. The two sets of variations were apparently the most warmly appreciated of all the great pianist's efforts, and recall followed recall at the close of the first set. The reason for a larger share of enthusiasm being shown in these instances is probably because audiences as a whole care more for pure virtuosity than deep musical expression, and it is in the variations that Bülow's exquisite delicacy of execution is most conspicuous; for in the sonatas details are always subservient, and, therefore, except in the rarest instances, are overlooked. The reading of all the sonatas was, in most respects, entirely according to tradition. If the attentive hearer finds points which seem to come out with greater force or with a new meaning in the Doctor's serious and elevated readings, the means which bring about the result are to all appearance so slight as to be scarcely noticeable; for here, as everywhere, the most important effects are the simplest. The sonata in E flat, op. 31, is understood to be an especial favourite with Bülow, and his peculiarly sympathetic reading of the first movement and the minuet, could hardly fail to reveal the fact to any but the dullest.

HANDEL SOCIETY.

The Handel Society concluded its present season with one of its most successful concerts. The praise implied by this remark is the more significant, considering that C. V. Stanford's spirited, but exceedingly difficult, Cantata, "The Revenge," formed the pièce de resistance, and a work by a modern native composer more worthy of association with the great master from whom this excellent Society borrows its name could not easily be found. Another noteworthy association, personally sought in vain by the humble and retiring Johann Seb. Bach with the somewhat haughty and imperious Handel during their lifetime, was musically realised at this interesting concert by a performance of the Leipzig Cantor's wonderfully impressive Cantata, "God's time is the best," whilst Handel himself was represented by an excellent rendering of a Concerto for two violins and violoncello, by Miss L. M. Nunn, Hon. Edward Thesiger, and Miss G. Nunn; a fitting contrast to Bach's sombre work being afforded by Mozart's Litany in B flat, which succeeded it. The soli were most effectively given by Mrs. Howard Tooth and Mr. John Probert, and all concerned, including the zealous conductor, Mr. F. A. W. Docker, may be justly congratulated on the termination of the sixth season of what may not unfairly be considered one of the most useful musical amateur societies in the Kingdom.

MR. AMBROSE AUSTIN'S CONCERT.

It has been remarked—if not by Shakespeare, by some equally comprehensive writer—that virtue is its own reward. The virtues of enterprise, courtesy, and generosity last night reaped their full reward in the case of Mr. Ambrose Austin, for certainly the crowded and distinguished audience that then assembled came not so much to listen to artists of the highest rank as to do honour to the gentleman who, after 30 years' unwearied service, is now retiring from the management of St. James's Hall. And the band of artists who gave their aid last night is further proof, where none is needful, of the esteem in which Mr. Austin is held by those who have been brought professionally into relation with him. Of the concert itself little need be said. The artists were all old favourites, and the only disappointment was that occasioned by the absence, through illness, of Madame Albani. The task of sustaining the soprano parts, therefore, fell upon Madame Valleria, who was, of course, entirely capable of bearing the burden. The audience was roused to enthusiasm by her brilliant rendering of "Mia Piccirella," and in response to a determined encore, the great diva gave a highly passionate performance of the old but ever-fresh "Kathleen Mavourneen." Then the three finest contraltos now on the English stage, Mesdames Trebelli, Patey, and Antoinette Sterling were there, Mdme. Trebelli singing "Vieni che poi sereno," the second-named lady Beethoven's "Creation's Hymn," and the last Dr. Mackenzie's "A dear wifie," and, with an appropriatness which was instantly recognised, "Auld Lang Syne." Mr. Sims Reeves, too, was there, and sang "The Message," Mr. Blumenthal himself accompanying, and further joined Mr. Santley in "All's well." It need not be told how Mr. Edward Lloyd sang "Lend me your aid," nor with what spirit Mr. Santley gave "Son of the Ocean Isle." Mr. Maybrick sang "The Owl;" M. Vladimir de Pachmann played pieces by Chopin and Weber; Dr. Richter conducted a performance of the "Tannhaüser" overture; and Mr. Cusins the "Leonora" and "William Tell" overtures. Such an array of art could not fail to gratify Mr. Austin, showing, as it does, with what undiminished respect the musical world bids him farewell. It is pleasant, however, to know that it is only in one capacity, that of manager of St. James's Hall, that Mr. Austin is taking leave of us, and that we may expect to hear more of him in other sorts of musical service.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Mr. Gabriel Thorp gave a very successful concert at Steinway Hall last week. A pleasing baritone voice, a good idea of what will suit it, and, most certainly, ability to make the best use of it, should stand Mr. Thorp in good stead. He was supported by some old friends, such as Miss Fairman, Miss José Sherrington, and Mr. Henry Parker, while younger blood was worthily represented by Miss Bertha Moore (who sang a charming song by Mr. Algernon Lindo), Miss Adele Myers, Mrs. L'Estrange, Messrs. Ernest Cecil, and Cecil Traherne, W. Nicholl, and Lawrence Kellie. Miss Amy Hickling (violin) and Miss Frances Thomas (clarionet) were very successful, the latter especially coming in, and deservedly, for much applause.

Mrs. L'Estrange gave a concert at Steinway Hall on Monday last, at which she received the aid of, amongst others, Mr. William Nicholl, Mr. H. Thorndike, Miss Mary Carmichael, and Miss Maud Webster, the latter lady contributing a clever parody of a well-known ballad of G. R. Sims'. Mrs. L'Estrange was heard to advantage in two new songs by Henri Logé, "Fidelis," and "Among the hay," and in Miss Carmichael's duet, "Daybreak," in which she was joined by Mr. Nicholl, who also gave an excellent rendering of two new and clever songs by Frances Allitsen. Mr. Thorndike introduced another novelty in the shape of a song by Miss Carmichael, "The King of Denmark's ride," which spirited work he sang with much expression.

Mr. Horace Cadogan, at his pianoforte recital last week, at Princes' Hall, gave evidence of considerable executive power, although his playing is distinguished rather by force than refinement. It is probable that Mr. Cadogan can do much better than he did on that occasion, for his programme was not of a sort to afford him much scope for the display of the artistic qualities which he certainly seems to possess; being, with one or two exceptions, extremely trivial.

Miss Hope Temple's Concert, at Princes' Hall, on Tuesday, was more successful than is usually the case when a programme consists largely of the concert-giver's works. Miss Temple has compassed the most difficult part of the song-writer's art—the being popular without being trivial or commonplace. The concert in question included a number of her elegant compositions, some entirely new. Amongst the latter class, "In Sweet September," sung admirably by Mr. Hayden Coffin, is certainly the most charming. Besides the latter gentleman, Miss Temple received the help of such well-known singers as Mrs. Mary Davies, who sang, with all her own delicacy, "She wandered down the mountain side," Miss Agnes Jansen, and Mr. Lawrence Kellie.

Miss Liza Lehmann and Miss Lena Little are singers who, young as they are, set admirable examples to many of their seniors, by the extreme refinement and grace of their art, and one might search far in the desert of matinées before finding so pleasant an oasis as was the concert given by these ladies on Saturday last. Miss Lehmann, whose purity of style is well-nigh perfect, sang Gordigiani's "O Santissima Vergine," and Brahms's "Sandmännchen," and appeared also to interpret two charming songs of her own composition. Miss Little gave a highly sympathetic rendering of Massenet's "Poeme d'Octobre," and Grieg's "In summer the woods are green," and joined her sister artist in Schumann's "An den Abendstern," and Dvoràk's "Die Bescheidene." Valuable aid was also given by Mr. Barton McGuckin, whose recent wanderings have in no wise injured his voice; by Mr. Herbert Thorndike, and Herr Carl Mayer, a singer from the Cologne Theatre, who is possessed of a baritone voice of considerable power and value.

Miss Daugars and Miss Lee gave a very successful concert last week at St. George's Hall. Miss Daugars is a pianist of considerable merit, and in selections from Chopin and Moskowski, and in Beethoven's sonata in E flat, op. 31, displayed a good combination of technical and mental qualifications. Miss Lee selected for performance Blumenthal's "Sunshine and Rain," Thomas's "Nuit de Mai," and Helmund's "Mädchenlied," in each of which her voice, a bright soprano of good quality, was heard to advantage. Miss Helen D'Alton gave a good rendering of De Lara's mystic "Garden of Sleep," and Mr. George Cox and Mr. Lawrence Kellie contributed some interesting songs.

Mdlle. Marie de Lido gave an extremely successful concert at the Portman Rooms, on Friday week. The lady herself gave an admirable rendering of the cavatina, "La notte è scesa," from Bizet's "I Pescatore di Perle," and in duets with the Countess Sadowska, and Mr. Hirwen Jones gave further evidence of her artistic qualities, a Russian duet given by the two sisters being especially fresh and attractive. Mdlle. Badia, Mr. Iver McKay, Mr. Frederic King, and Mr. Herbert Thorndike, also gave valuable aid, and Mdlle. Marianne Eisler played with singular grace and executive skill, Leclair's "Sarabande et Tambourin." Special mention should be made of Mr. Wilhelm Ganz, by whom the chief burden of accompanying was borne.

The annual concert given by Mr. W. G. Cusins, master of the Queen's music, was not less interesting than is usual with this gentleman's performances. It derived additional value from the fact that Señor Sarasate, who is now one of the most cherished idols of those who haunt miscellaneous concerts, appeared, and in conjunction with the concert given himself, opened the concert with a good performance of Beethoven's Kreutzer sonata, and, later on, played some of his favourite Spanish pieces in his own masterly fashion. Mdme. Nordica sang Hérold's "Jours de mon enfance," and Tschaikowsky's "Toujours à toi," in a very charming way, and Mr. Santley sang songs by Schubert and Schumann. Mr. Cusins gave admirable readings of some selections from Chopin, and also, in conjunction with Signor Piatti, played the barcarole and finale from Rubinstein's sonata in D.

The additional, and, it is to be feared, genuinely "farewell" concert announced by Señor Sarasate took place on Saturday afternoon. It need only be recorded of it that the enthusiasm created by the performances of the distinguished Spaniard was in no way diminished, his rendering of Beethoven's and Mendelssohn's Concerto, in especial, eliciting demonstrations of the utmost approval. The orchestra, under Mr. Cusins, distinguished itself by an excellent performance of Saint-Saëns's "Rouet d'Omphale."

Sir Charles Hallé gave the fourth of his chamber concerts on Friday week. A charming suite of four violin pieces, a Benedictus, a Zingaresca, a Berceuse, and a Saltarello, written by Mr. Mackenzie, were played with the utmost grace and delicacy by Madame Norman-Neruda, and an admirable performance of Brahms's trio for pianoforte, violin, and horn was not the least interesting feature of the concert.

Mr. Richard Blagrove's instrumental concert took place on Friday week at Steinway Hall, the concert-giver himself performing on the concertina with much skill. The most interesting items on the programme were a quintet of much beauty, for concertina and strings, by Sir S. Macfarren, and a duet for treble and baritone concertinas, founded on airs from "Les Huguenots," by Mr. Blagrove himself.

Mr. Lawrence Kellie's third vocal recital at Steinway Hall, on Wednesday evening last, attracted a fashionable and very enthusiastic audience. Mr. Kellie's own compositions were naturally the principal attraction, and perhaps the most successful of these were, "Lady leave thy silken thread" (Mdme. Wilson Osman), "Is it too láte" (Miss Damian), "An autumn story" (Miss Rosa Leo), "Song of the peasant's wife" (Miss Bertha Moore), and "If love were what the rose is," and "The day has a thousand joys," sung by the composer. Mr. Kellie also sung a very effective new MS. song, "In dreamland," and for the first time a new song, also in MS., by Miss Hope Temple, "A golden argosy." This latter song (which was accompanied by the composer) should become a favourite. Judging from the numerous recalls, Mr. Kellie has raised himself and his songs to a high position in public estimation. Herr Johannes Wolff contributed some excellent violin solos, and Mr. George Giddens two amusing recitations. Mr. Algernon Lindo and Mr. Raphael Roche conducted.

Herr Ludwig and Mr. Whitehouse gave the second of the series of Chamber Concerts on Wednesday evening, providing a programme of considerable interest. They were assisted by Messrs. Collins, Gibson, Heydrich, and Leo Stern in the interpretation of the beautiful Sextet in G major of Brahms, and Beethoven's Quartet in C major, in both of which their ensemble playing was really excellent. That clever young pianist, Mdlle. Jeanne Douste, sustained her part in Haydn's E major trio with such intelligence and expression, that she fairly charmed her audience. The only solo by Mr. Whitehouse was Boccherini's 'cello Sonata in A major, in which his purity of intonation and musicianly phrasing were displayed to great advantage. Miss Lena Little was the vocalist, and contributed songs by Handel, Grieg, and D'Albert.

A pianoforte and vocal recital was given by Miss Isabella Stuart Smyth and Miss Edith Robiolio, on Saturday last, at Portman Rooms, the ladies being also assisted by Mr. C. E. Stephens. Miss Smyth is a pianist of considerable ability, and in her selections, which included Beethoven's "Les Adieux" Sonata, Chopin's "Second Scherzo," and Henselt's "Wiegenlied," gave evidence of much artistic faculty. Miss Robiolio sang, with taste and skill, the familiar "Voi che Sapete," and "Nobil Signor." Mr. Stephens introduced, in conjunction with Miss Smyth, a duet by himself, which proved a clever and interesting composition.

Madame Sophie Lowe gave, with Miss Mathilde Wurm, a concert on Tuesday. Madame Lowe is favourably known as a vocalist of the German school, and on the present occasion introduced several interesting songs, besides taking part in a good performance of Brahms's "Love song waltzes," the instrumental part of which was sustained by Miss Mathilde and Miss Alice Wurm, and the vocal by Miss Little, and Messrs. Kaufmann and Thorndike. Miss Wurm played with excellent taste and execution one of Bach's Preludes and Fugues, and also two pieces by Scarlatti.

PROVINCIAL.

BIRMINGHAM, June 4th.—The selection of a candidate for the post of Town Hall organist has been reduced to the three following, from whom the appointment will ultimately be made :—Mr. A. H. Brewer, organist of St. Michael's, Coventry ; Mr. C. W. Perkins, St. Michael's, Paddington ; and Mr. H. C. Tonking, Professor of the Organ at the Portman Academy of Music, London. The testimonials sent by these gentlemen are of the highest standard, and before the appointment is finally made their qualifications will be privately tested upon a neutral organ by two distinguished experts. Mr. C. W. Perkins is a Birmingham man, and previously to going to London officiated as organist at the Wreatham-road Church, Handsworth. He is a good organ player, accompanist, and acknowledged to be a good all-round musician, and if my prognostics are correct, he will be the one elected. Dr. Hans Richter came on Wednesday and temporarily took up Mr. Stockley's position as choirmaster in order to test the quality of the choruses and to impart that essential light and shade to the works to be rendered in accordance with his own powerful artistic conception. He found but little to do, the choruses being note-perfect and otherwise well-balanced. The work under rehearsal was Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," the accompaniments being given by the piano only. It had been proposed to take also some choruses from "Saul," but Dvorák's sublime work took up the allotted time. The choral rehearsals will be continued fortnightly till the end of June, when the choir will be required to devote three nights a week to their work. The Amateur Opera Society gave another performance of "Iolanthe," this time at the Prince of Wales' Theatre, in aid of the Homœopathic Hospital. The cast was the same as previously recorded. The fifty-first monthly concert organised by the Clef Club, was given at their rooms, in Paradise Street, the chief features being Beethoven's String Quartet in C minor (op. 18, No. 4) and Onslow's Quartet in B flat (op. 21). Mr. F. Ward (first violin), Mr. E. W. Priestley (second violin), Mr. W. H. Priestley (viola), and Mr. A. J. Priestley (violoncello) Mr. Ward is an accomplished artist, an excellent leader, and, as a solo-violinist, he ranks among the first in the Midland counties. Mr. W. H. Priestley and his clever sons combine in themselves a trio of skilful musicians seldom to be met with. The vocalists were Mr. G. T. Edwards, and Mr. H. C. H. Peacock. The latter possesses one of the finest and richest baritone voices I have ever heard, and reminds one strongly of Signor Cotogni in his palmy days. There lies a great future before this young artist. His singing is remarkably good, and his phrasing at once displays his natural artistic gift.

ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS.

You are kindly requested to write for Ainsworth's "New Patent Organ Pedal Combination List." Ainsworth's "New Patent" is perfectly unique and may be combined easily with any Piano. It is the only one which may be safely combined with any Piano without deteriorating the instrument. Having put down at my works two engines and machinery of the most desirable kind, I am now supplying my goods at a price which enables every organist and organ student to have always ready for use in his Studio an

ORGAN PEDAL PIANO,

AFFORDING PERFECTLY UNIQUE PEDAL PRACTICE.

34, Sheen Park, Richmond.

DEAR SIR,—I have deferred writing to comment upon your Pedals and Action now attached to my pianoforte until I could satisfy myself of their utility and efficiency. I can now conscientiously say that they more than fulfil all my anticipations. Although I am no carpenter, aided by your lucid diagram I had little difficulty in attaching them myself, and it is impossible to over-estimate the comfort they give to me or to conceive the saving of time one experiences in one's own room.—Believe me, yours truly,

BURNHAM HORNER, F.R. Hist.S.

To Mr. Mr. Ainsworth.

DEAR SIR,—It gives me great pleasure to bear testimony to the perfection of your Invention. I am more than satisfied with your Patent Action and Organ Pedals, and consider them worth double the money. Organists and organ students who desire to improve in the Art of Pedalling, which is so essential to a good organist, will do well to procure a set. I have seen no Action half so effective, and one can sit at the Piano and play, "Fixed in his everlasting seat," or any other organ music, or organ arrangement with the greatest pleasure. The touch of pedals could not be better, and the action is as you say, "Absolutely free from annoyances." They cannot be too highly recommended, as by their use, rapid progress is certain.—Believe me, sincerely yours,

I. B. Thornton,
Organist, Birstall, Leeds.

Cologne, July 16th, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have much pleasure in informing you that your Pedals have given the fullest satisfaction. I have them combined with my practice Piano. Many of my musical friends who have seen them, as well as my organ pupils, are quite delighted with them; and I must acknowledge that I have never met with any Pedals so noiseless and pleasant to play upon as yours. The Action I consider durable, and of very good workmanship. Every organist who desires to perfect his playing will welcome your invention. I can recommend your goods in every respect.—Yours truly,

HERR J. RODENKIRCHEN.

To John Ainsworth, Esq. Organist, The Cathedral, Cologne, Germany.

TOOLS.—In order to facilite the attachment, a complete set of tools are sent (four in number) each one marked for its particular use. By the use of these tools, and following carefully the directions, ANY ONE can make a really good attachment.

On Receipt of Trade or Professional Card, you will receive List, with Liberal Terms.

THE

KARN AMERICAN ORGANS,

WOODSTOCK, ONTARIO, CANADA.

The Karn Organ is a reproduction of the Pipe Organ in miniature, of pre-eminent value as an effective music exponent for the Home.

OUR AIM has not been to see how cheaply an organ can be built, BUT HOW CHEAPLY A FIRST-CLASS ORGAN can be made.

OUR CLAIM is that we are building organs equal to, if not surpassing, all others, at the very lowest reasonable prices.

A GUIDE FOR PIANOFORTE STUDENTS

By RIDLEY PRENTICE.

CONTAINS ANALYSES OF WELL-KNOWN PIECES PROGRESSIVELY ARRANGED, ENABLING THE PUPIL TO UNITE A STUDY OF MUSICAL FORM WITH THE ORDINARY PIANOFORTE PRACTICE.

Saturday Review.—"We are far from suggesting that there is any royal road for acquiring technical knowledge, but we are quite certain Mr. Ridley Prentice's road is in every way the pleasantest that has yet been laid before any pianoforte student."

Academy.—"A knowledge of form is imparted in simple and pleasant language. We heartily commend it to all who desire to understand, satisfactorily interpret, and enjoy beautiful music."

Graphic.—"Written with the laudable purpose of helping the pianoforte student to understand and enjoy beautiful music."

School Board Chronicle.—"A useful book for earnest teachers."

Musical Review.—"Mr. Ridley Prentice has newly developed an important though much neglected branch of the teacher's duties."

Monthly Musical Record.—"No more valuable work of the kind is in existence."

Facts and Comments.

It is not for the MUSICAL WORLD to tell sad stories of the deaths of kings and emperors. But even a journal concerned exclusively with the interests of art cannot fail to linger for a moment over a tale so full of human pathos, of sufferings heroically borne and heroically shared, of conjugal love parted only by death, of virtue and excellence shown in all the relations of private and of public life, of valour in the field of battle, of gentleness and liberality in the council-hall, as that which has come to a close at Berlin.

With the politics, and the supposed "militarism," and the personal qualities of the new Emperor we are not concerned, but it will interest musical readers to know that William II. is a most ardent Wagnerite, and that his name, with a very handsome sum attached to it, stands first amongst the guarantors of the Bayreuth Festival plays. Perhaps his conservatism may have something to do with this artistic bias, for, curiously enough, it was the princes and nobles and the Tory Press of Germany who first took up the cause of Wagner, a rebel and outlaw, while the Liberal papers were, and partly are to this day, hostile to the great reformer. Here is a a coincidence for subtle-souled psychologists to ponder over.

The rebuilding of the Opera Comique on its ancient site, but with an outlet and a handsome façade on the Boulevards des Italiens, has at last entered the stage of practical politics. The cost of the new edifice, including the purchase of land necessitated by the improvement just referred to, will amount to rather more than 4,000,000 francs, and for that handsome sum the Chamber will forthwith be asked. Fancy any one proposing to the House of Commons to spend £150,000 on the building of a theatre, to say nothing of annual subventions and other douceurs liberally granted by republican France to the divine art.

It never rains but it pours, one is inclined to exclaim on reading of yet another scheme for the propagation of music recently started in France. This refers to the opening of a third great national opera, not, for a wonder, in Paris, but in Rouen. The Paris Grand Opera, that white elephant left by the second Empire to the third Republic, does, neither as a building nor as an institution, satisfy the claims reasonably made on it, and things have been going from bad to worse under the present management; so much so that many distinguished French composers look for an adequate representation of their works not to Paris, but to Brussels. This is to cease, says a group of musical Frenchmen, who believe in decentralisation. In consequence, an influential committee, comprising MM. Reyer, Lenepveu, and Cahen, the composers; and Vitu, Wilder, and Fourcaud, the critics, has elaborated a scheme which also will shortly be submitted to legislative sanction. According to this, the management of the state and city-supported opera of Rouen, would have to undertake to produce new works to the aggregate amount of twelve acts every year. Apart from the local subscription he would also have to open a subscription for Paris amateurs at reduced prices, this latter to be only for first nights. He would also have to make an arrangement with the railway authorities to secure reduced fares for the Paris critics and amateurs wishing to attend the performances. The contact between metropolitan and provincial intelligence thus achieved, might prove beneficial to both, and as the journey from Paris to Rouen is only of two hours duration, there is no reason why the scheme should not be practically feasible.

"A German "Marguerite" set to music by a Frenchman, and sung in Italian by a Swede in a Russian theatre—here is a nice mixture," says the Trovatore at Milan, in connection with the performance of Gounod's "Faust" at the Russian theatre of Riga, in which the rôle of Marguerite was sung by Mdlle. Alma Fohstrom. We might cap the story of our contemporary by the recent cast of "Faust" at Covent Garden, when an American, Mdme. Nordica; a German, Mdlle. Bauermeister; two Poles, the de Reszkes; and a Frenchman, M. Lassalle, all belaboured the unfortunate lingua toscana according to their sweet wills, Mdme. Nordica more especially pronouncing the "u" in "una" in true English fashion, as if it were a diphthong. But the de-Italianizing of Italian opera is too old a theme to be harped upon any more.

The British aristocracy is not singular in its susceptibility to the charms of operatic songstressess. There has lately died at Meran, in the Tyrol, a distinguished musical amateur, who went through the law court, if not through fire and water, for the sake of his charmer, and afforded an example of fidelity to all faithful lovers. This was Prince Rudolph, of Lichtenstein, who, already married, and a Catholic, chanced to meet, in Vienna, a certain Mdlle. Edwige Stein, who was not only a good musical artist, but was endowed with the most ravishing beauty. Of course the Prince fell in love with her, and so strong was his affection that he divorced his wife, and forswore his faith, that he might marry the captivating Edwige. His family tried to cut off the entail, but did not succeed, and after some years he obtained possession of his fortune. Things had gone badly with the faithful Prince, however, in the interval. He had been compelled to work for a livelihood, first by giving private musical lessons, and afterwards by becoming music-copyist to Richard Wagner. On his re-instatement in his position he pursued his studies of music, and published, amongst other things, some volumes of dance-music. Whether he and his songstress lived happily through all these direful straits, history sayeth not, though, of course, the romantically-minded reader will assume that they did.

At a recent sale of autographs, in Paris, a letter addressed by Berlioz from Weimar to Léon Kreutzer fetched the highest price, viz., 81 francs, while an autograph epistle of Auber was sold for 12 francs, one by Meyerbeer for 11 francs, and one by Hummel for 9 francs 50 centimes. To a philosopher this scale of prices might suggest a good many pointed remarks as to the comparative value of popularity and immortality.

Wagner's early opera, "Die Feen," will shortly be produced at Munich, if all goes well, or, perhaps, we should say if all goes ill. For what purpose can be served by the revival of this juvenile production, which the author himself had given to oblivion, it is not easy to see. The story of the plot is briefly this: A young prince, Arindal, loves the fairy Ada; but in order to gain her love, has to undergo all manner of trials, to one of which he succumbs; Ada, in consequence, being changed into a stone. Brought to despair, he penetrates into fairyland and finds the stone, which he reanimates by his impassioned song, and the pair are then united. All this is a little childish, but it no doubt opens some musical possibilities; and it is, at any rate, interesting as showing, even at this early period, Wagner's inclination towards mythical subjects.

The interchange of visits between eminent musicians of the old and the new country has formed a very pleasant feature in our recent musical doings; and an interesting event of the kind may be expected next autumn, when Mr. Theodore has announced his intention of coming amongst us, together with his American orchestra, thus affording English amateurs an opportunity of witnessing concerts they have often read about, and which have now obtained world-wide celebrity.

Mr. Edward Lloyd has no intention of forsaking his country, at any rate this year, and in spite of the blandishments of American entrepreneurs, he is just now resolutely shaping his engagements in the direction of Chester, Hereford, Birmingham, Bristol, and the Crystal Palace.

Mr. Sarasate's concerts have now come to be regarded as an established institution in London, and another series of these excellent entertainments may be expected in the course of next season.

Among the representative musicians present at Kensal Green Cemetery on Thursday, last week, at the funeral of the late Mrs. Balfe, was Mdme. Christine Nilsson, who contributed to the numerous floral offerings a beautiful wreath. Canon Duckworth read the service, and besides the immediate members of the family, Mr. Barton M'Guckin, Mr. Duncan Davison, Mr. Stewart (the publisher). and Mr. John Gill, of the Royal Academy of Music, also attended.

The programme of M. De Pachmann's pianoforte recital, to be given at St. James's Hall, to-day, will include an original composition, by Dr. Hans von Bülow, and three short pieces, "Allegretto Grazioso." "Romance," and "Scherzo," from the pen of Mr. F. H. Cowen.

It is expected that this popular virtuoso will now prolong his stay in England, in order to make a concert tour next autumn, in conjunction with Mdme. Antoinette Sterling.

Little surprise will be felt at the announcement that the young violinist, Henri Marteau, intends following up his recent success at the Richter Concerts, by further appearances later on in the year.

Everybody remembers the Cowboys' Band which, at the exhibition of the redoubtable Buffalo Bill, used to play its somewhat limited repertory with such industry. The Cowboys, however, knew a good instrument, and the appended letter from one of them, to Messrs. Besson, the well-known musical instrument makers, of Euston Road, is by no means exaggerated in its praise of the manufactures of that firm. Messrs. Besson are about to ship, for the Melbourne Exhibition, a case of new instruments, which are in many points not far short of perfection. Many technical improvements have been introduced, not the least noteworthy of which is a "trill-valve," which is affixed to the trombones of the ordinary sliding sort, and which enables a performer to obtain a very perfect shake. A useful little instrument of the cornet family is the new pocket soprano, which contrasts oddly enough with the huge bombardons in the same case. Besides these technical qualities, the finishing and chasing of the instruments is wonderfully artistic. This is the characteristic letter referred to:—

Messrs. F. Besson & Co.

DEAR SIRS,—The cornet received this noon, all right; it not only knocked myself completely out, but Sweeney, and everybody else; the first remark Sweeney made after blowing it, was, "Its as true as a dice and excellent in tone," and was never in such luck.

Colonel Cody saw it first, and says "its magnificent."

Major Burke never saw the like of it before.

Fred Matthews, our Deadwood Stage Coach driver, using a Western term, say it's "The High Cock of the Dandies."

Wild West girls are in love with it, and the Indians are wondering to themselves.

Respy., &c. (Sd.) T. V. MURPHY,
Wild West, Buffalo Bill's Cow Boys' Band.

P.S.—The cornet is a "little wonder." I am tickled to death with it.

We understand that Mr. Max Heinrich, whose singing was so successful at M. Musin's concert on Tuesday, contemplates permanent residence in London.

We are sorry to learn that the state of Mr. Joseph Barnby's health has compelled him to relinquish work. We hope that he may find his lost health in Harrogate, to which place he has been temporarily banished by his doctors.

Miss Carlotta Levy announces a concert at Steinway Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, which should prove of considerable interest. We believe that the young lady has, until very recently, studied as a pianist, but, acting on the advice of some experienced judges, has abandoned instrumental music, and now proposes to appear as a vocalist.

Miss Florence Emerson, who has for some long time been incapacitated, by serious illness, from work, announces a concert—the first since her recovery—to take place at the Steinway Hall, on Tuesday next, when she will perform, amongst other interesting items, Tosti's new song, "We have loved." Miss Emerson will be heartily congratulated on her recovery.

Much as one may doubt of the wisdom of an attempt to familiarise lovers of Wagner's music with the master's greater works by an interpretation of his masterly orchestration on a grand pianoforte, there is nothing but praise due to the committee of the London Branch of the United Richard Wagner Society for the successful effort they made on Tuesday evening last, on the occasion of the annual conversazione, to entertain a large gathering of musical amateurs with excerpts from "Der Fliegende Holländer," "Götterdämmerung," "Rienzi," "Die Meistersinger," "Träume," and the "Siegfried Idyll." The members of the Ladies' Choir of the Hyde Park Academy of Music, conducted by Mr. H. F. Frost; Miss Pauline Cramer, Miss Marguerite Hall, Miss Alex Elsner, Miss Mary Willis, Herr Carl Mayer, Mr. Wm. Nicholl, Mr. Henry Phillips, Mr. B. H. Grove, Mr. Josef Ludwig, the leader of a small but admirable orchestra, and Mr. Carl Armbruster, the conductor in chief, gave excellent aid in the realisation of the programme. It is seldom that we have spent so exceedingly pleasant an evening.

Mr. Jocelyn Brandon's adaptation of Daudet's "L'Arlèsienne" was given for the second time at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, on Wednesday, and was extremely successful. Bizet's music, with which we are more chiefly concerned, was performed exquisitely, under the direction of M. Ivan Caryll, and should surely win for "L'Arlèsienne" a lasting success. The cast on this occasion was excellent, and, indeed, it is only under such a manager as Mr. Leslie that one so admirable could be found.

Something approaching a realisation of what most well-wishers of our national museums and galleries have often hoped to see, finds expression each succeeding year on the occasion of the Society of Arts' conversazione. On Wednesday evening last the glorious treasure-house of art at South Kensington was made doubly attractive by the aid of a musical setting of the jewels which it contains. In the North Court the famous string band of the Royal Artillery, under the conductorship of Cavalier L. Zavertal, and in the East Architectural Court the Blue Hungarian Band, led by Herr Berkes Bela, pleased an ever-changing crowd with excellent renderings of well-known music. The cast, too, of many a famous sculptured hero basked in an atmosphere of music created by the Criterion Hand-bell Ringers and Glee Singers, conducted by Mr. Harry Tipper. Although such a programme as this is not to be expected on ordinary occasions, would it not add vastly to the attractiveness of our national museums if some form of musical accompaniment could be incorporated into the general scheme of national art education?

Mr. Frederic Corder and Mr. Henry R. Bird have been elected members of the Council of Trinity College, London.

FINSBURY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

In view of establishing a Musical Institute for the North of London, a very successful bazaar was held at the Holloway Hall, on June 5th, 6th, and 7th. In the unavoidable absence of the Lord Chancellor, Mr. H. L. W. Lawson opened the bazaar on the first day; Dr. A. C. Mackenzie performed the same office on the succeeding day; and Mr. Harry Waddy represented his father, Mr. Waddy, Q.C., M,P., the esteemed President of the society, on the third day of the bazaar. The addresses of these gentlemen were of much interest; Mr. Lawson dealing with the subject of music as an engine of social improvement; Dr. Mackenzie, the Principal of the oldest educational institution, the R.A.M., offering a welcome to the newest and still to be formed Conservatoire, and Mr. Waddy speaking on behalf of the President as one labouring in the good cause in the midst of old friends.

Mr. Waddy, M.P., presided on the first day, Mr. E. H. Turpin taking the chair on the second and third days. The esteemed conductor of the Association, Mr. C. J. Dale, and other gentlemen holding responsible offices, including Messrs. G. W. Betjemann, Gilbert Hankey, Leonard Courtney, Hayman, J. P. Harding, etc., took active parts in the meetings. It is said that some £800 were taken. It may now be assumed that the new Institute will commence work in September, as proposed. The Finsbury Choral Institution has already done a great and good work in uplifting music in the North of the Metropolis. The far-sighted authorities of the Association recognise the public mind as distinctly in favour of systematic musical training under the auspices of an influential and complete institution. The new foundation will do good to the profession in the North of London, creating both direct and indirect employment.

London, as Dr. Mackenzie pointed out, is so vast a city, that as a mere question of saving time and reducing distances, each district must to some extent develop their own interests. Then the Association will have the unique advantage of combining the work of tuition with the kindred task of training and presenting musical performers throughout their rehearsals and concerts. With such claims for support, the Association deserves every good wish for its success in the new and important educational scheme so auspiciously inaugurated.

As a brief chronicle of a recent event, one must not neglect mention of the admirable musical performances given upon this occasion, the fine singing of Madame Clara Samuell, Madame Fassett, Miss M. Owen, Messrs. A. Thompson, Bridson, and Forington, the artistic and finished pianoforte playing of Dr. Marsden of Manchester, the admirable performances of Mr. Carrodus, and his sons, and the talented Wallun family, and the artistic labours of Messrs. Rose, Chapman, and Thomas.

Correspondence.

MUSICAL CHAUVINISM IN GERMANY.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

In the Musical World of the 12th inst., I notice the following: "Considering that Germany is chauvinistic to the core, especially in musical matters, and has long cherished the principle that no music can ever come out of England, the triumph of Mr. Lamond is all the greater."

This I beg to contest. On the contrary, I maintain that more eclectic and cosmopolitan audiences than the German, always only too delighted to welcome anything new and good, no matter of what nationality, do not exist. It might as well be objected, that only an infinitesimal quantity of modern German music has been performed, and even the names of some prominent German composers are absolutely unknown in this country. I quote at random a few instances drawn from my own recollection. Sterndale Bennett was appreciated in Germany, where, indeed, many of his works were published some forty years ago, perhaps even more than in his own country. Masterly and much admired performances of his pianoforte sextet were given, within my remembrance, at that time. The Harp virtuoso Parish Alvars's German tour, with performances of his own works, was a succession of triumphs. J. L. Hatton's opera "Pascal Bruno," with the great basso, Standigl, in the cast, met with a favourable reception. Balfe's "Four Sons of Haimon," and "Bohemian Girl," enjoyed long runs on German operatic stages. Onslow's pianoforte trios, string quartets, and more especially his numerous string quintets and first pianoforte sextet, I believe all published in Germany, were among the chief delights of amateur chamber music. John Field's nocturnes are accepted as "classics." Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Mikado" Companies met with signal favour from the public, and unstinted praise from the Press. A. C. Mackenzie's pianoforte quartet in E flat was published, and I presume appreciated, in Germany, and brought out in London by a set of foreigners of the "Teuton tribe," many years before the name of the composer of "Colomba" became known in this country. C. Villiers Stanford's pianoforte quintet was first performed by, and is incorporated in the reportoire of, another set of "Teutons," the Cologne Heckmann quartet, who also introduced a pianoforte trio, by Hubert Parry, during their short penultimate season at Steinway Hall. The first-named composer's "Irish Symphony" was brought out with great success in various German musical centres. So was Frederick Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony. Goring Thomas's opera, "Esmeralda," had a favourable reception at Frankfurt-on-Maine. Eugène D'Albert is voted a "star" among pianoforte virtuosi. His new string quartet was brought out by Joseph Joachim, at Berlin, and his orchestral works have been heard in various German cities. Henry Hugo Pierson established his fame as composer of operas and important choral works chiefly in Germany. Speaking of executants, the pianist, Fanny Davies, met with general approbation before the most critical German audiences. The extraordinary qualities of that veritable youthful pianist-prodigy, Pauline Ellice, met with far more adequate recognition in Germany than in her own country. The same remark applies, according to your own paragraphist's admission, to Frederic Lamond, both as a pianist and composer, who, to my personal astonishment, almost "fell flat," especially as regards the musical Press, on the occasion of his remarkable pianoforte recitals at Princes' Hall.

Much more might be said on this subject, but I will limit myself to the above statement of facts.—I am, sir, yours truly,

A German.

May, 1888.

P.S.—Singularly enough, I just notice, in confirmation of my contention, the following remark by Otto Lessman in the Allgemeine Musik Zeitung of the 11th and 18th instant, in reference to the indifferent performance of Glinka's "Life for the Czar," by the Russian Operatic Travelling Company at Berlin:—"Will the Berlin public possess sufficient taste to place in this case against its frequently blind glorification of everything foreign, a feeling for artistic dignity, and the esteem due to a noble work of art?"

TAKING BREATH.

To the Editor of The Musical World.

Sir,—It has lately been my privilege or my misfortune—according to the ability of the vocalists—to have been present at several concerts, and I have been struck with the inartistic and injurious manner in which nearly all the vocalists take their breath. Nearly all draw in the breath through the mouth with a gasp, which is sometimes audible at the farthest end of the hall. Now, there are always particles of dust floating about in the air, which are thus necessarily drawn into the lungs, and which, as necessarily, are injurious to them. The proper mode of inhaling is, of course, through the nose. This is laid down in all books; but anyone who tries this method alone will soon find that a sufficient quantity of air cannot be inhaled, while a disagreeable snuffling is often made by those who practise it. There is, however, a plan by which the necessary amount of air can be drawn into the lungs with no possibility of injury and in less time than by the plan ordinarily adopted. Anyone who knows anything of the construction of the throat and the operations of the various parts, is aware of it and practises it; but, to judge from what we hear at all concerts, the number of such persons is limited.—I remain, Sir, yours truly,

Rupert Garry.

INSTRUMENTAL.

We have received two pleasing gavottes by M. H. Synge, "The Kalakana" (J. B. Cramer and Co.), and "The Royal Marine Artillery" (Weekes and Co.), the former especially making an excellent pianoforte piece. The same composer has written a pretty and serviceable waltz entitled "Queen Bee." "Childs' Play" is a series of easy pieces composed for young beginners by John P. Attwater (Wilcocks), and intended to illustrate musically various time-honoured pastimes and familiar incidents of youthful life. These little themes bearing such Schumannesque titles as "Getting Tired," "In the Swing," "Follow the Leader," &c., contain some really pleasing melody, and, while difficulties of execution are kept within appropriate limits, show in their designs unmistakable evidence of fancy and experience. There is not much that is Shakespearian beyond the title in No. 3 of "Shakespearian Sketches," by Frank Adlam, for which he has chosen the words, "Alas! poor Ghost" (Macklin and Co.); but though it raises no ghost, drawing-room and schoolroom performers will find in it a tuneful little piece. "Bagatelle," No. 1 of "Fairy Fancies," by J. H. Trevor, is rhythmical and decidedly pleasing, and ought to be popular with young pianists (Swan and Co.).

An excellent arrangement for the organ of Spöhr's well-known "Rose, softly blooming," and Wilson's "The Shepherd Boy" has been supplied by Joseph Trousselle (Macklin and Co.). Players of that instrument, or of its American substitute, as well as of the harmonium, will also find a serviceable selection of short pieces in Book 2 of "Tench White's Library" (Tench White). No. 12 of William Dawson's "Original Compositions for the Organ" consists of a very graceful Pastorale in A major (W. Dawson).

Among the comparatively few numbers in Verdi's opera, "Otello," which lend themselves to effective performance in the drawing room, is the "Ave Maria," sung by Desdemona in the last act. It is quite possible for a capable vocalist, in sympathy with the situation, to convey an idea of the pathos and simple beauty of this prayer, even when separated from the tragic surroundings amid which it occurs on the stage with so much impressive effect; and English amateurs will be further assisted in the realisation of this scene, by the admirable English version now supplied by Francis Hueffer.

Messrs. Pitt and Hatzfeld send "Zwei Lieder," for alto, by A. Samuelli, entitled "Wanderers' Nachtlied" (Goethe's words), "Der Liebe Segen." Both are songs of superior class, and receive additional interest from an accompaniment melodic on its own account, without unduly diverting attention from the voice part. "Dreams of the Past," a song by A. Romili (E. Ascherberg & Co.), though it seems to be rather laboured in some parts, is well written and decidedly above the average. "Kenneth and Marjorie," by L. Denza, is a prettily conceived song dealing with the aspirations of two little children; although the sentiment gets rather conventional when the inevitable angels come in. In "Aunty's Rose," by Frederic Lohr, the singer indulges in sad memories with fairly pathetic effect (both the above same publishers). An album of twelve pleasing songs for children has been contributed by J. Cliffe Forrester (Charles Woolhouse). The absence of restraint, natural to the subject, has evidently been favourable to the composer's endeavours after appropriately simple and melodic themes.

In "Waken, Waken," "A Little Lullaby," and several other instances, Mr. Forrester has been specially happy in this respect, the number least to our liking being the setting of C. Kingsley's "Song of a Doll." "Love's Serenade" is a moderately effective rendering of verses by Sir Walter Scott, for voice, violoncello, and piano, by Arthur Smith (London: Music Publishing Co.).

Hart and Co. send a graceful trio for female voices by Earnest C. Winchester, entitled, "Crowning of the May."

Also received, a part song by Martin S. Skeffington, "Children's Prayer Time" (Skeffington and Son), a charming unaffected little composition which is sure to find favour with choral societies, and a "Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis" for four voices by J. Humfrey Anger (Novello, Ewer, and Co.).

HECTOR BERLIOZ AND JULES JANIN.

By Andre de Ternant.

In an essay on the friendship of Boccaccio and Petrarch, contributed about twelve years ago to "Macmillan's Magazine," it was remarked that "It would be easy to prove that the genus irritabile vatum is not so entirely void of the feeling of good fellowship as popular prejudice has frequently asserted." In a musical journal it will be perhaps more appropriate to mention the friendships of Haydn and Mozart, Schumann and Mendelssohn, and last, but not least, the beautiful affection between Wagner and Liszt. The instances of intimacy between literary men and musicians have been somewhat uncommon, but if an attempt were made to enumerate them, the names of Berlioz and Jules Janin would certainly not be left out. It cannot, indeed, be said that Jules Janin had the same intimacy with Berlioz as the obscure poet and literary man, Humbert Ferrand, or the even more obscure musician, Auguste Morel; but from an artistic point of view their friendship is decidedly more interesting. The absence of any letters between them in their published correspondence may be easily explained: both were on the staff of the same newspaper, the Journal des Débats, one as the dramatic critic, and the other as the musical critic, and had frequent opportunities of seeing one another.

Jules Janin and Berlioz seem to have commenced their literary careers about the same period, and if we go back to their early childhood, it will be seen that both were receiving a slight smattering of musical knowledge, and, strange to say, the future feuilletonist's education in that direction was more thorough than that of the future symphonist, who was to be looked upon by posterity as the greatest French composer of the century. In order to prove this, it is only necessary to quote a passage from Janin's most authoritative biographer, M. Piedaguel, who, in addition to remaining his life-long friend, spent his boyhood in the same provincial town:—

"He (Janin) played the harp, even better than King David. Sometimes we assisted in the musical services at the church. Janin played the prophet's instrument, myself the violin, his master (M. Bédard) the double bass, and another the viola. Our master of philosophy also sang some Alleluias, with a clear and powerful voice. These seraphic concerts only took place on grand and special occasions, when we were allowed to dine at the same table of honour in company with Messieurs les Chantres."

Of course, such harmless diversions were not likely to bring any more grist to the mill than did Berlioz's early performances on a broken guitar and the flute. So, in course of time, Janin, like most ambitious provincial youths, went to seek both fame and fortune in Paris, at that time, as far as art and letters were concerned, the most brilliant city in the world. It would occupy too much space to enumerate both Berlioz's and Janin's experience, and the small remuneration they received from various periodicals of short duration, which did not much improve the state of their finances. But, happily, this led to something more lucrative, and, in 1829, Janin secured a post on the Journal des Débats, and early in the following year succeeded Duvicquet as the dramatic critic. As Berlioz himself relates in his "Memoires" how he became attached to the staff of the same paper, after his return from Italy, I cannot do better than quote what he says:—

"One day, not knowing which way to turn, and anxious to gain a few francs, I wrote a sort of novel, called 'Rubini à Calais,' which appeared in the Gazette Musicale. I was desperately sad when I wrote it, but the story was full of fun, a contrast which is known to occur often enough. The sketch was reproduced in the Journal des Débats some days later, with a few words from the editor, full of kindly feeling for the author. I went at once to thank M. Bertin, who proposed that I should edit the "musical feuilleton" of the Debats itself, a much coveted throne of criticism, which was vacant through the retirement of Castil-Blaze. At first I was not its sole occupant, and for some time had only to write critiques on concerts and new compositions. Later on those on the lyrical theatres devolved upon me, but the Theâtre Italien remained under the protection of Delecluse, Jules Janin preserving his rights over the opéra ballets. I then gave up the feuilleton of the Correspondant, and limited my critical labours to such as could find a place in the Débats and the Gazette Musicale.

For many years Berlioz's articles were signed "H. x x x," and those of Janin appeared with the initials "J. J." But their identity was an open secret to the public, and the two critics became fast friends. In fact, this is not astonishing, considering that both were endowed by nature, in a superlative degree, with the same virtues, and at the same time, it must be confessed, with the same fault, viz., a propensity for attitudinising. One of Berlioz's most intimate friends, Ferdinand Hiller, remarked that he was one of those men with whom it is a necessity to appear always interesting, even to themselves. Of Jules Janin, on the other hand, many persons who were intimately acquainted with him report that he seemed to say in the presence of his friends, "Me voila? regardez-moi bien; de face, de profil, de trois quarts; vous ne pouvez me faire plus de plaisir qu'en tirant mon portrait à cent mille exemplaires!" Although the last-mentioned quotation has been applied to more than one vainglorious Frenchman, very few will question the truth of it; but with all his faults Janin certainly had a kinder heart and more sympathy with his fellow-creatures than Berlioz.

The Organ World.

IN CHURCH HALF A CENTURY AGO.

Anniversaries, Jubilees, and Centenary Celebrations alike invoke the tendency of human beings to look back into given past periods, and to search the stores of memory in order to contemplate incidents and manners which, originally common enough, assume a new interest under the magic-working hand of time. In "Fifty Years Ago," a work by Mr. W. Besant, the following passage deals with the then common method of conducting church services :—

> The musical part of the service was, to begin with, taken slow, incredibly slow; no one now would, who is not old enough to remember, believe how slow it was. The voluntary at the beginning was a slow rumble; the Psalms were very slowly read by the clergyman and the clerk alternately, the "Gloria" alone being sung, also to a slow rumble. The choir was generally stationed in the organ loft, which has been known to be built over the altar at the east end—as at St. Mary's, Cambridge—but was generally at the west end. It was not a choir of men and boys only, but of men and women. The "Te Deum" was always "Jackson"—from my youth up have I loathed "Jackson"; there was just one lively bit in it for which one looked and waited; but it lasted a very few bars; and then the thing dragged on more slowly than ever until it came to the welcome words, "Let me never be confounded." Two hymns were sung very slowly, they were always of the kind which expressed either the despair of the sinner, or the doubtful joy of the believer. I say doubtful, because he was constantly being warned not to be too confident, not to mistake a vague hope for the assurance of election, and because, with the rest of the congregation, he was always being told how few in number were the elect, and how extremely unlikely that there could be many of those few in one flock.

Certainly we have made some advances in the past fifty years, and many changes for the better are to be noted in the conduct of our church services, and it may be—as the above-quoted author assumes—that religious thought is more vigorous and brighter in tone, like our church services, than it was in the early years of Queen Victoria's reign. There is a self-complacency in looking back to less-favoured periods, and this feeling takes a distinctly pronounced form in the minds of those who, living in an age of wonderful progress, endeavour in a half-pitying fashion to revive memories of even "fifty years ago." So one must beware of the danger of this as of other forms of self-righteousness, in pondering over the changes which have permeated all forms of human thought during the period just now at an end. All the changes which have come about in our church services are not matters for the indulgence of unchecked self-congratulation. It may be that the services were gloomy and the music was taken too slowly fifty years ago; but is it not true that we often go to the other extreme? It may indeed be questioned whether the old-fashioned slow tunes were not better calculated to create devotional feeling than our modern jaunty, part-song-like tunes, and our indecently gabbled psalms. Surely in this matter there should be a medium it would be well to try to find. The opening voluntary which Mr. Besant is pleased to call "a slow rumble," was often a dignified, sedate piece of contemplative music, known then as "A Diapason movement," in which the calm, smooth flue work of the old organs told with an effect rarely heard in these days. Again we have entirely lost the "Middle Voluntary" of half a century ago, in which the last generation delighted. Then there were fewer services and church duties, and more quiet rest on Sundays; the doctrine "change is rest" had not come to the front; churches were not so much the arenas of competitive clerical eloquence; and people were not travelling about on Sundays so constantly to hear popular preachers. Old people still talk of the "middle voluntary," which was "a kind of offertory piece without a collection," to quote a somewhat Irish description; a piece to be enjoyed without distraction of any kind, and an acceptable and not incongruous break in the service form. This was played at various points of the service; as after the Psalms or second lesson, or between the different sections of the combined service-forms. Though the old organs lacked the weight and depth of modern pedal organs, the bass notes descending to the low G or F were full, rich, and satisfying, and have hardly been fully replaced as yet by our large scale pedal organs. But "fifty years ago" Gauntlett and William Hill were beginning their crusade which led to the adoption of C pedals and manuals, and Bach was at last to be heard after his own manner. "Fifty years ago," as Dr. E. J. Hopkins has told us, choral service was only to be heard in London at the cathedrals and the Chapel Royal, and soon after the Temple Church led the way to what is now the all but universal adoption of fully musical services. It might be shown, however, that half a century ago, good concerts and orchestral music were not so far behind our modern standard as we are apt to suppose. It would be possible also to show in connection with this subject that rough and incomplete as they were, the village bands to be found in church "fifty years ago," deserved more consideration than was shown to them in the days when harmoniums and small organs came into use in our poorer churches. Now we are, forsooth, turning back and re-introducing orchestral instruments into church with undeniable gain. All things considered, we may be hopeful; and certainly in our church services and music, we are acting more in the spirit of the old motto Felicem reddet religio, than did those who had the ordering and management of things "fifty years ago."

THE ORGAN AND THE CLASSICS.

In the last great visit, when the "Elijah" was produced, we have no record of any organ playing. Then followed the awful shock of the sudden death of his beloved sister, Fanny, a shock which seemed to break the great man up.

Never but once again did he touch the organ. As soon as the great blow had partly been overcome, he started for Switzerland with his family, Paul Mendelssohn, and his bereaved brother-in-law, Hensel. Week after week passed, and his nerves were still too weak to bear noise, his piano "was not for playing on, but for trying a chord." His only solace was the little organ at Suggenberg, by the Lake of Brienz, and it was there that he touched the organ keys for the last time in his life. November 4th of the same year he was dead.

I have endeavoured, by means of these accounts of Mendelssohn's organ playing, to picture the scenes before you, but nothing gives us so keen a view as the following extract from the obituary notice, Nov. 13th, 1847:—

"His mechanical facility on the pianoforte was prodigious . . ."

"He preferred, however, the organ to the pianoforte; since on that nobler instrument his ideas, always cast in large and orchestral proportions, amplified by every resource of consummate learning and experience, could be most thoroughly impressed by his vigorous hand. His memory was prodigious and his fancy inexhaustible. The writer may be permitted a moment's reminiscence of the master's organ improvisations—most probably his last. The time was a few days before he left Switzerland—the place a hamlet church, by the side of the Lake of Brienz, inaccessible by road, and only to be reached by steps in the rock overgrown with ivy, and moss and maidenhair—the organ, a poor little instrument, built by a Wallasian maker.

"It seemed, however, as if the poet's spirit gave it power and voice and grandeur, as he sat there, for the pleasure of one or two friends, exciting himself by his own performance; chain after chain of lofty thoughts and noble modulations unfolding themselves, till the confined space and the limited means under his grasp were forgotten in the triumphant exercise of that art which, as Milton says, brings—'All Heaven before our eyes.'"

With Mendelssohn we have concluded our survey of the position of the organ in the life and writings of our great classic composers.

In final summary we find that Bach and Mendelssohn, the two Lutherans, were great organists, while Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, as Catholics, were attracted to the music of the Mass, and thus, as we have before seen, directed away from the organ.

And lastly, I have suggested that Bach and Handel lived in a contrapuntal age, while Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven lived in an age when the style of the time was such as to lead them also away from the instrument.

In Mendelssohn we find a resuscitation of the contrapuntal, interwoven with the passionate, two varieties of expression amply exemplified in his compositions for the organ.

CHURCH MUSIC.

In a paper read some time ago, before the Music Teachers' National Association in America, by the well-known organist and church musician, Mr. S. B. Whitney, the following passages occur:—

"Two questions would seem to present themselves at the outset. What ought church music to be? How ought it to be rendered? I shall try and treat these questions only in a general way, without giving especial prominence to my own personal preference for any particular style of music, or any particular kind of choir, for otherwise the second question might be entirely superfluous. Were we to decide, for instance, that cathedral music or music written to be antiphonically sung by a double choir of boys and men, was by far the noblest, and purest form of music that could be offered up in the sanctuary, we would by this decision rule out the second question, How ought it to be rendered? For to be consistent, such music should only be rendered when we have all the conditions at hand for which it was written. I think all will agree, however, that we should have the best of its kind, in the matter of music, whether a mixed choir, boy choir, or quartet is employed in its production, and the choir should be equal to the demands of the music in every case.

"I take it that the office of music in the church, is twofold in its nature, not only to express, but also to excite, or stimulate devotion. It reaches in this way the multitude of worshippers, those who can join, as well as those to whom nature has denied the gift of song. Music for the church should be distinctive in its form, like the architecture of the temple in which it is rendered. No one would mistake Cologne Cathedral, or York Minster for a town hall or a court-house. Both are built in accordance with the rules of a particular style of architecture, which would seem to belong almost exclusively to the church. So let music written for the church bear the stamp of Catholicity. I use the term in its broadest sense. Let it be Gothic if you will. In any case let it be distinctive, as I have said, something the like of which you will not be likely to hear the next day at the opera-house or concert-room. It would certainly be a poor compliment to the young composer to be told that his anthem would have been better adapted for an opera chorus, or for the rising young organist to be reminded that his closing voluntary went to the heels, rather than to the head or heart. No such criticism could possibly be made if the anthem or the voluntary was constructed according to the strict rules of form laid down by the best writers of church music. There should not enter into sacred music anything of a frivolous character, nor should it suffer from haphazard construction.

"It demands strict form as alone suited to its dignity and gravity. But let us not imagine, as one has well said, that to be dignified it must be heavy, or to be grave it must be melancholy. Dignity requires the true vivacity of conscious power, and gravity is supremely consistent with sweetness and cheerfulness. We must have what I have called strictness of form, to set it unmistakably apart from the lighter uses to which a style less severe is adapted. Strictness, severity of technical idea, is certainly not any hindrance to grace or sweetness, any more than the bony structure of the human form is a hindrance to the marvellous beauty of the most illustrious examples, or the severity of mathematical accuracy and strictness of scientific principle to the highest beauty in architecture. In these cases it is obviously the only condition of perfection. So let our church music be distinctively Gothic in its structure, but not carpenters' Gothic, with just enough of counterpoint to condemn it, as far as the unlearned are concerned, and not enough to save it, as something of any intrinsic value to the truly musical. Let the young composer who enters this sacred field determine that he will be an architect, or, better, an artist, and not a mere builder. He should constantly keep before him this simile of the cathedral or church as embodying in itself the noblest form which church music can take on, the choir, transepts, and nave, representing in more or less detail the various parts assigned respectively to clergy, choirs, and people in the service. If I were asked to name some one composition as illustrating perhaps better than any other this idea, I should say that Bach's Passion Music would fully come up to the requirements of the case. Here is music for solo voices, soloists whom nature has endowed with peculiar gifts.

"Then besides the concerted music we have the grand choruses, by the masses of trained singers, representing the chorus in the choir. Then every now and then are introduced those mighty chorals for the congregation, also represented by the great congregation in the nave and transepts, where all, soloists, choirs, and all within the building, join in one grand hymn. Certainly this composition, with its wonderful elaborate orchestral and organ accompaniment, is the best possible illustration of the perfection of musical detail, bringing together, as it does, in one grand mass all the resources of song or sound known to man. You see it meets the demands of the simile in every case. On first looking at a cathedral we take it as whole—as one grand mass of stone. We wonder at its size and immense proportions. But our wonder increases as we go over the building and take into detail each delicate bit of carving or painting. Perfection of detail, and the impressiveness of the grand mass, are equally worthy of our admiration, no less in the building than in the music. But more particularly is the Passion Music to be held up as a true model of what church music ought to be from the fact that it brings together all the known resources of the musical art. Of course I shall be asked: 'Do you expect to reproduce Passion Music in every little parish church in the land?' To which I reply: By no means; but a principle can be carried out any and everywhere. Let the best voices in any locality be selected to lead in the principal parts of the services, of others less gifted, but equally useful and necessary, can be formed the chorus, and in the grand old familiar hymns and chants let the whole congregation swell the chorus, and thus make of the service one united offering up to God of that we have to give Him, to praise Him for His mercy and goodness to us. I do not cite the Passion Music as an illustration of church music to be slavishly imitated, but its form is to be kept constantly before the mind of one who aspires to compose or even to arrange music for the high uses of the worship of the sanctuary. The great master seems to have exhausted the resources of his art that he may bring together in one grand service the highest skill of the trained soloist and instrumentalist, the wonderful power of a well-trained chorus, and, greatest and best of all, the mighty choral when the whole congregation can supplement the efforts of those who have gone on before to lead the way. It seems to me that such music never ought to be sung in a music-hall, for it is to be considered as a service and not a mere musical performance, and demands for its surroundings the stately pillar and graceful arch, the 'dim religious light' of the cathedral or church. In short, its religious character is so clearly recognised that whenever it is sung outside the church the request is always made that the inevitable applause should not be given after the different numbers. No, rather let this music be always sung in church, where Gothic architecture, which has been likened to 'Frozen Music,' will form a most fitting casket for the precious jewels of sacred song, as contained therein.

"Now I claim that the idea on which this musical service is founded—that of employing all available musical talent of whatever degree of excellence—can be carried out in any parish church. Certainly in this country, where so much attention has been, and is given, to the subject of singing in the public schools, there can be found in every locality those who can be enlisted to take the more elaborate parts of the music. Then the chorus can be formed from the Sunday school, if from no other source, and if simple hymns, chorals, and chants are selected for parts of the service, the congregation will not fail to accept the invitation thus held out to join at the proper times and places. Thus we have all the essential elements and distinguishing features of the Passion Music, trained soloists, trained choristers, and the congregation. There are those who claim that no music should be sung in church except that in which the whole congregation can join. This is an error, no less from a philosophical than a musical point of view. Such people lay great stress upon the expression 'common praise,' and deny that any congregation has any right, as they say, to praise God by proxy. But let us inquire for a moment the real meaning of the term common praise, and see if the proper definition will warrant us in coming to any such conclusion. A similar term is used as technically describing the office book of the Church in this country. It is called the 'Book of Common Prayer.' Yet in this liturgy the clergyman has a good share of the service all to himself, the people occasionally making a response, or an amen at the end of a prayer. I think, however, that the term Common Prayer is by no means a misnomer, as applied to this book. If I enter heart and soul into a prayer that is said by a clergyman, and at the end respond, Amen! it is by this act as much my prayer as it is his, and in this way the whole congregation, joining in the responses at the proper times and places, make one grand service of clergy and people, a service that could not be better described than by the technical name, Common Prayer, for it is common to both clergy and people. The same generous definition given to that other term Common Praise, will give us soloists, chorus, and congregation, each having its part in the services of the sanctuary. For consider for a moment to what narrow limit we would confine this mighty power for good, if we were to rule out all music except such as that in which the congregation could join in each individual measure. We would thus deprive ourselves of all the greatest compositions of the great masters, who, being denied the privilege of a hearing in the temple, would give to the world, rather than to the Church, their greatest musical inspirations. The question arises can the church afford to give up in this way all the best music to the world? Why should she not lay claim to the highest inspirations of the composer, as she has long since done to those of the painter and sculptor, the most illustrious examples of whose art are to be found in the cathedrals of Europe? Can she, I say, afford to give them up for the erroneous idea that every individual worshipper is to sing, or have the opportunity to sing each and every individual note of music used in divine service? Nay, rather let her take a broader view of the subject. It is certainly as much the office of music to excite and stimulate devotion as it is to express it. Here, again, the analogy of architecture comes into play. We are moved to devotional feelings by the surroundings of Gothic architecture—arches and pillars—in the building of which we had no share, yet they none the less excite in us devotional feelings, and make us more fully to realise that we are in a holy place. Why ought we not to allow music also to excite in us similar devotional feelings when the anthem is sung in which we take no part? Hard, indeed, must be the heart that is not moved and made better by hearing the "Hallelujah" of Handel, and the other grand choruses from the "Messiah." Let the humble worshipper join in all parts of the service where he can render intelligent assistance, but let him remember that as the spire of the great church towers aloft far above choir, transepts, and nave, so it is given to the trained singers to soar aloft far above and beyond, to heights where the great congregation cannot expect to follow. But let the latter, listening in reverent silence, be moved to greater devotion, and thank God for the exceptional musical gifts vouchsafed to the few, though denied to the multitude. In the liturgical service I have alluded to its chief merit considered from an artistic point of view, which consists in its responsive character, people responding to clergy; and the parts assigned to the latter would lose much of their dignity and power if said by a number of voices rather than by one. The greater contrast is allowable, when the many voices respond to the one, and the same is true from a musical standpoint. Can any one imagine that Handel made a mistake when he selected the words for one of the greatest solo numbers in the Messiah: 'I know that my Redeemer liveth.' Of course he used the words as they occur in Holy Scripture, but I only use this illustration to show how that in certain cases one voice can far more effectively bring out the meaning of a sentence than can a multitude. We know that our Redeemer liveth, or similar words sung by a chorus, would be far less impressive—and I only mention this in confirmation of the fact that music should be allowed all her varied forms of expression in the church, whether of solo, duet, trio, quartet, or grand chorus, that she may the better illustrate the sacred text and give it a dignity of expression befitting its divine character."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

In further reply to A.C.O., a distinguished organist calls attention to a beautiful Suite in four movements for organ, violin, and violoncello, by Rheinberger. The pieces mentioned already by Merkel and Macfarren should have been respectively described as Adagio in E, and Andante and Finale in E minor both for organ and violin.

H. T. M. is informed that "Observations on Wind Instruments," a lecture delivered before the College of Organists, may be obtained in pamphlet form of Messrs. Weekes and Co., 14, Hanover-street, for sixpence.

The joint committee appointed to select an organist for the Birmingham Town Hall and Festivals, selected three candidates for the final selection. They are:—Mr. A. H. Brewer, St. Michael's, Coventry; Mr. C. W. Perkins, St. Michael's, Paddington; and Mr. H. C. Tonking, St. Luke's, West Norwood. The judges were Sir John Stainer and Dr. Bridge, and the competition was announced to take place in Westminster Abbey.

An evening concert was given lately in Paris by M. and Mdme. Gigout. The most remarkable works were the pianoforte quartet of M. Boellmann, and the Andante and Allegretto of the concert-giver, played by the author on his fine organ of Cavaillé-Coll. The Minister of Fine Arts has bestowed an allowance on M. Eugene Gigout, as a tribute to the value of his School of Organ-playing. M. Gigout intends to devote it to the foundation of scholarships at that institution.

SPECIFICATIONS.

NEW YORK.—The following is the specification of an instrument now in course of construction at Calvary Church, Fourth Avenue, New York, the builder being Mr. Frank Rossevelt. A complete west-end organ has yet to be added to the now completed chancel organ. The instrument will consist of three widely separated portions, all to be connected with one console, which will be placed in the choir :—

Notes.

Mr. J. Waterman has been appointed organist of Brompton Parish Church.

Mr. F. G. Shinn, A.C.O., has been appointed Organist of All Saints, Clapham Park.

The music at the funeral of the German Emperor consisted chiefly of selections and chorale from Bach's works. The instrumental portion was sustained by the organ. The choir consisted of over 100 voices.

At our cathedrals, Royal chapels, and churches sounds of mourning for the late Emperor of Germany have been universal; funeral anthems, hymns, and marches have musically testified our national sorrow and sympathy.

Selections from Macfarren's "David," with Mendelssohn's Ninety-eighth Psalm, were given at Trinity Church, New York, with great effect, on Ascension Day, by choir, orchestra, and organ, under the direction of Mr. Messiter, the organist.

A blowing apparatus, worked on a new principle, not explained as far as the writer knows, has just been added to the organ of St. Paul's Church, Alnwick. It has been designed and patented by Mr. Henry Newbiggin, of the Alnwick Foundry and Engineering Company.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS' CALENDAR.

On Tuesday next, June 26th, the library will be opened from 7 to 8. On the same evening, at 8, at the Bloomsbury Hall, Lecture by Dr. C. W. Pearce, on "Some Suggested Modifications of Day's Harmony, to meet the various objections raised against his Theory." Dr. E. J. Hopkins will take the chair. July 17th, 18th, 19th, F.C.O. Examination; July 20th, Diploma Distribution; July 24th, 25th, 26th, A.C.O. Examination; July 27th, Diploma Distribution. Candidates should send in their names, with fees, on or before July 10th. Every information may be obtained on application. Other arrangements and particulars will be duly announced.

THE CHARACTER OF ORTRUD.

The recent revival of "Lohengrin" at Covent Garden makes it seem appropriate to draw attention to Wagner's own ideas as to the manner in which that opera should be performed, which appear in his correspondence with Liszt, just published by Messrs. Grevel, of King Street, Covent Garden. We refer more especially to a curious passage bearing on the character of Ortrud. That character is no doubt the most complex and difficult in the whole opera, and most singers get over that difficulty by simply not acting the character at all, but limiting themselves to the ordinary gestures and facial distortions which are the accepted formula of operatic wickedness. But Wagner's early admirers were not satisfied with this superficial view of the case. They wanted to arrive at the real essence of Ortrud's nature, and Princess Wittgenstein wrote a letter to the master propounding a curious dilemma. We give both this letter and Wagner's answer addressed to Liszt:—

"Weymar, January 4th, 1852.

"Just returned home, with my eyes still moistened by the tears brought to them by the moving scenes of 'Lohengrin,' to whom should my thought turn at this moment but to you, sir, with the desire that you could have witnessed the effect produced by your beautiful work, better understood as it is every day by executants and spectators? I cannot tell you with how much zeal the former endeavour to respond to the efforts of Liszt for the worthy interpretation of your drama. Having been ill and absent from Weymar for a year, I was this evening able to judge how indefatigable Liszt has been in his instructions, recommenced again and again, and becoming ever more fruitful. You would certainly be satisfied with the progress they all make at each new representation. .

"Fräulein Fastlinger having left our theatre, Frau Knopp Fehringer takes the part of Ortrud. The former having been generally successful, both as a singer and an actress, opinions are divided as to the latter; and you, as the creator of the part, can alone decide which of them is preferable. The former had the undoubted advantage of eighteen years, a pretty face, a slim, tall figure, which qualities, as they placed her in age and in beauty near to Elsa, suggested the idea of secret rivalry between woman and woman. One thought that she not only desired to win the throne of Brabant, but was also jealous of Frederick and the charms of her from whom she had torn him away. The timidity, natural to so young an artist, gave to her movements the restraint which is so characteristic of youth, and the instinct of a rival. Frau Knopp has over Fräulein Fastlinger the advantage of consummate and very impressive dramatic talent, but she is not very beautiful, in spite of regular features, and not in her first youth, beside which her figure is rather thickset. Her action indicated every nuance with admirable eloquence; she rendered the disdain, the hatred, the rage, which alternately inspire her with gestures and pantomimic actions of such striking reality that she might be compared to the greatest artists in the most famous parts. But she could not be more than an ambitious woman. Between her and Elsa the spectator's mind could not see any comparison or rivalry, and this has no doubt put out many of the audience without being able to account for the reason, for nothing could have been more admirable than the acting of Frau Knopp, infinitely more energetic, more richly coloured, more living, more certain, more bold, than that of Fräulein Fastlinger.

"It is then for you, sir, to say whether in general it is better to give the part to a young and beautiful artist, whose acting is naturally less experienced and more subdued, or to a woman of matured talent, who gives us an Ortrud less young, but more inflamed and devoured by the secret flames of hatred of one who is vanquished and the revenge of one who is oppressed. As to myself, I cannot say which of these two conceptions produced the greater impression; the second has certainly something more sombre, more inexorable, about it. One trembles in advance for Elsa on seeing that such hands will fashion her destiny; one is inclined to say that the premeditation of a whole life gives more grandeur to the struggle between ambition and innocence.

"Pardon, sir, this long digression; it will show to you how much your poetic conceptions occupy us here. I must not close these lines without telling you how I have been touched by the manner in which you speak of him whose glorious name I am soon to bear. Who could fail to speak of his spirit, of his genius, of his intelligence? But one must have a high-toned and delicate soul to understand the infinite tenderness of his soul, which so few can feel or divine. He will, no doubt, write to you soon. This evening, after the close of the performance, he accompanied some people who had come from Leipzig to hear your 'Lohengrin.'

"Good-bye, dear sir. Permit me to thank you for all the rare pleasures we owe to you by the contemplation of your beautiful works, and accept the expression of my distinguished esteem.

"CAROLYNE."

WAGNER'S REPLY.

"To Princess Wittgenstein, who has delighted me with a very friendly letter, I ask you to express my best thanks for her kindness. The deep interest which she has again shown in my 'Lohengrin,' particularly at the last representation, is of priceless value to me. Her intelligent remarks on the character of Ortrud attracted me especially, as well as the comparison she makes between the efforts of the previous and the actual representative of that part. To which side of the question I incline your valued friend will recognise at once when I explain to her my view of the character by simply saying that Ortrud is a woman who does not love. By this everything that is most terrible is expressed. Politics are her essence. A political man is repulsive, but a political woman is horrible. This horror I had to represent. There is a kind of love in this woman, the love of the past, of dead generations, the terribly insane love of ancestral pride which finds its expression in the hatred of everything living and actually existing. In man this love is ludicrous, but in woman it is terrible, because a woman, with her strong natural desire for love, must love something; and ancestral pride, the longing after the past, turns in consequence to murderous fanaticism. In history there are no more cruel phenomena than political women. It is not therefore jealousy of Elsa perhaps for the sake of Frederick which inspires Ortrud, but her whole passion is revealed only in the scene of the second act where, after Elsa's disappearance from the balcony, she rises from the steps of the minster, and invokes her old, long-forgotten gods. She is a reactionary person who thinks only of the old and hates everthing new in the most ferocious meaning of the word; she would exterminate the world and nature to give new life to her decayed gods. But this is not merely an obstinate, sickly mood in Ortrud; her passion holds her with the full weight of a misguided, undeveloped, objectless feminine desire for love: for that reason she is terribly grand. No littleness of any kind must occur in this representation; she must never appear merely malicious or annoyed; every utterance of her irony, her treachery, must transparently show the full force of the terrible madness which can be satisfied alone by the destruction of others or by her own destruction."

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The performance of "Lohengrin" on Saturday last was certainly the event of the opera season, and the crowd which filled the vast theatre to its utmost capacity is surely a sufficient answer to those who profess to believe that the general public is deaf to the appeals of Wagner's music. In this case, at all events, the truth has been revealed to the innocent public, which has discovered the power and beauty at present hidden from some of the "wise." The cast in the present instance was an excellent one, including, as it did, Madame Albani, Madame Hastreiter, the brothers de Reszke, and Signori Navarrini and D'Andrade. Madame Albani's interpretation of the part of Elsa was in many ways new, for on this occasion she seemed so carried out of herself that the artist in her obtained a pre-eminence all too uncommon with this lady, who not seldom makes bids for popularity at the sacrifice of loyalty to her art. After her performance of Saturday night, Madame Albani must certainly take a higher rank than ever before as a truly conscientious artist. She was well matched by M. Jean de Reszke as the Knight of the Grail, who, in the main, sang and acted superbly, although in one or two instances the mantle which Madame Albani has discarded seemed to have fallen on the shoulders of the tenor, who more than once played to the gallery in a way lamentable in the case of such an artist. The farewell to the Swan, however, and the great duet with Elsa were declaimed with magnificently artistic power. M. Edouard de Reszke played King Henry the Fowler with great power and breadth and his conception of the part was admirably truthful. The part of Ortrud is certainly one of the most complete and subtle of Wagner's creations, and it is not surprising that Madame Hastreiter failed to give any very decided significance, although her performance of the extremely difficult music was on the whole good, from the technical point of view. Signor Navarrini as the Herald, and Signor d'Andrade as Telramund deserve considerable praise; but it is certainly to Signor Mancinelli that the chief honours fall. Not only was the orchestra technically accurate, but the conductor had infused into it a large share of the true Wagnerian spirit, and the performance was admirably poetic throughout. It remains only to say that the mise-en-scène was almost as good as it could possibly be.

On Tuesday night, "Il Barbiere" was given, with Miss Sigrid Arnoldson as Rosina, M. d'Andrade as Figaro, and M. Edouard de Reszke as Basilio. Rosina is one of Miss Arnoldson's best parts, and in it she achieved considerable success on Tuesday. The other artists were all satisfactory, although Signor Ciampi exaggerated the part of Bartolo.

Concerts.

MADAME CHRISTINE NILSSON'S FAREWELL CONCERT.

Since Madame Nilsson announced her intention of retiring from public life, everyone has been hoping, with whatever faintness, that the announcement might, after all, prove a brutum fulmen. But it seems that the great prima donna's intention is unalterable, and the concert given at the Albert Hall on Wednesday must therefore be looked upon as her final farewell. And certainly it is better to bring such a career to a close while yet the qualities which have distinguished it are unimpaired.

Madame Nilsson's admirers—and who does not admire her?—could hardly wish for more gracious memories of her than those which will have been left by these last concerts. The first of the two, given a few weeks since, perhaps served more than the last to recall Madame Nilsson's greatest triumphs, although the programme of Wednesday night certainly contained some of her best-known airs. It is late in the day to speak in detail of Madame Nilsson's superb qualities. For they will not be lightly forgotten by anyone who has, and they cannot be described to any one who has not, heard her. The "Bel Raggio," from "Semiramide," "Angels ever bright and fair," Engel's "Lost,' and the pretty song written by Balfe expressly for Madam Nilsson, "There is a shadow,' were sung as only a great artis could sing them. Most of these were encored, as was also th "Miserere" from "Trovatore," in which Madame Nilsson was joined by Mr. Sims Reeves, the great tenor singing with the utmost passion and force. The vast and crowded hall was a wonderful spectacle, the enthusiasm of the audience growing with each successive appearance of the singer until, as the final notes of the "Jewel song" from "Faust"—which was the last encore song—died away, and it was felt that Madame Nilsson's farewell was taken, the excitement reached its climax. Of the rest of the programme it need only be said that Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mdlle. Douilly, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Santley, Mr. François Noije, Mr. Foli, Miss Marianne Eissler, Mdlle. Janotha, and Mr. Leo Stern, sang or played in a way not unworthy of the lady in whose honour the concert was given. Under such circumstances was brought to a close a career which has extended over nearly 25 years, and which will be remembered always as that of a supreme artist and a large-hearted woman.

M. OVIDE MUSIN'S ORCHESTRAL CONCERT.

A large audience assembled on Tuesday at Princes' Hall to welcome M. Musin back to England. The applause which greeted the Belgian artist on his appearance was proof of a popularity which an absence of four years has not abated, and which was won fairly by a skilfulness of technique and a depth of feeling not too common amongst solo violinists. M. Musin appeared first to perform a Concertstücke by Dr. Damrosch, the American musician. The work is written in the form of a serenade, in four movements, viz., introduction, intermezzo, notturno, and addio giogoso. Of these movements the intermezzo, vivacissimo e molto piano, is a very dainty piece of writing, both for the solo instrument and the orchestra, while the nocturne is full of dreamy passion. The orchestral writing is, in many passages, of great power and beauty, the scoring for wind being especially clever. It was played by M. Musin with admirable feeling and skill, and should prove a very welcome addition to the repertory of English violinists. M. Musin also gave Corelli's "Variations Serieuses," and introduced a novelty in the shape of a "Caprice," written by himself, which proved to be a very bright and clever work. The band was conducted by Mr. Walter Damrosch, son of the famous musician already referred to, and under his excellent guidance gave very spirited performances of Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony," and Liszt's first "Hungarian Rhapsody." Mr. Max Heinrich, of New York, sang with much fire and skill songs by Schubert.

DR. HANS VON BULOW'S BEETHOVEN RECITALS.

At the third recital, last Tuesday, the programme included the Appassionata, the rarely-chosen Sonata in F sharp major, the Fantasia, op. 77, the Sonata Caractérisque, and the last three Sonatas (in E major, A flat major, and C minor), leaving the "Giant" and the A major for the final recital. A more trying selection could scarcely have been made, but the greater the demand made on the intellectual, if not the physical, powers the more surely will Dr. von Bülow rise to the occasion; therefore, let no lover of Beethoven lose the chance of hearing the great B flat Sonata next Tuesday. A perfect storm of applause followed the magnificent rendering of the Appassionata, and the enthusiasm thus kindled from the first did not once flag through all the long programme. A very few bars sufficed to show that the great pianist was in his best form (for like all really great performers, Bülow is unequal). and his treatment of these later sonatas must have left some indelible impressions on his audience. Of "effects" and "points" there are but few in Bülow; but the beauty of the prolonged shake in the last variation of the C minor Sonata was particularly striking. The fugue in the A flat Sonata, with its suppressed passion, and the tender grace of the aria, will long be remembered by those who were present. The repeat in the finale of the Appassionata was not taken, and the trio of the Allegro molto in the A flat Sonata was played twice (i.e. returned to at the close of the movement), as the scherzo in Chopin's B minor Sonata is frequently played; and doubtless with the same object of making the movement more uniform in length with the other sections of the work.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust" was given last Monday at these concerts for the first time, and attracted a large audience. Herr Richter's reading of the work differs, in some respects, from that to which Mr. Barnby has accustomed London audiences, a noticeable point—to mention only one—being the considerably slower tempo adapted in the Easter hymn; but, as was only to be expected, his interpretation of the work was singularly fine, and the famous Hungarian march has perhaps never been better played. The Richter Choir, which has been considerably enlarged and now overflowed into the side galleries, sang the choruses with fairly good attack, but the balance of the voices leaves something to be desired, the basses in particular being a little weak. Of the soloists, Mr. Edward Lloyd's "Faust" is so well known, that it is sufficient to say that he has rarely sung better, and Mr. Santley, although not in his best voice, sang the music allotted to Mephistopheles with good effect. Mrs. Mary Davies's vocal means were hardly adequate to the demands made upon her by the part of Margaret, this charming singer being heard to more advantage in music of a less dramatic type, while Mr. Bantock Pierpoint sang well in the small part of Brander. The orchestra played admirably throughout. Previous to the concert the "Trauermarsch," from the "Götterdämmerung," was played in memory of the late Emperor Frederick, the touching music, so admirably appropriate to the occasion, being listened to by the audience, who remained standing, in respectful silence.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

The Philharmonic Society gave its seventh and last concert on Saturday, when Herr Johann Svendsen conducted the performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," which was given with singular precision and force, and was, on the whole, one of the most perfect interpretations of the work we have heard. The other work for orchestra alone was Dr. Mackenzie's "Scotch Rhapsody" in G minor, which the composer himself conducted. Fräulein Soldat performed Brahms's violin concerto, in the performance of which she gave evidence of much musicianly feeling and capacity. The pianist was Madame Sophie Menter, who gave a startlingly brilliant rendering of Rubinstein's pianoforte Concerto in G. Herr Carl Mayer, the baritone from Cologne, whose performances have already won much approval in England, sang with great power and truthfulness of sentiment Spohr's "Der Kriegeslust ergeben," Schumann's "Hondnacht," and Schubert's "Wohin."

MISCELLANEOUS.

Miss Emma Barnett gave a highly interesting pianoforte recital at the Márlborough Rooms, on Monday last, when she performed a well selected programme with much ability. The first selection included Bach's Prelude and Fugue in C sharp minor, and Beethoven's E flat Sonata, op. 31, of which latter piece Miss Barnett gave a very intelligent and musicianly interpretation. Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques" served to further display the young lady's executive power, while Moszkowski's "Serenade," was rendered with much refinement of feeling. Miss Barnett also introduced her own clever Gavotte in A, and her father's "Autumn Leaves," and fantasia on the "Ancient Mariner." Mr. Bernard Lane was the vocalist, singing, with a good deal of taste, Brahms's "Wie bist du meine Konigin," and Mendelssohn's "Garland."

The annual concert on behalf of the Crooms Hill Elementary Schools was given at the "Green Man" Assembly Rooms, Blackheath Hill, last week, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Ganz, who acted as conductor and solo pianist, playing in the latter capacity his own popular "Vision du Passé" and "Qui Vive" in a way which evoked loud and deserved applause. Miss Ida Agabeg gave a charming rendering of the conductor's "I seek for thee in every flower," and "The banks of Allan Water." Mr. Charles Ganz, who possesses a bass voice of good power and quality, achieved marked success in Pinsuti's "Bedouin Love Song." Valuable assistance was also given by Miss Frances Hipwell, Miss Ida Everard, Mr. Charles Chilley, and Mr. Willie Woltmann, who made his first appearance as a violinist, playing with good tone and execution a fantasia on "Faust," and Mr. Ganz's "Ave Maria."

Miss H. Sasse gave a Matinee Musicale at Messrs. Collard's Rooms, on Tuesday last. With singular modesty she announced herself on the programme as playing one solo and the pianoforte part in Schumann's Quintet in E flat, op. 44. This, however, did not satisfy her audience, and in response to a recall after playing a Rondo by Chopin, she played a Valse by the same composer. Both were distinguished by considerable ability and technical skill. Miss Carmichael's already popular songs "The King of Denmark's Ride" and "The Milkmaid," were ably rendered by Mr. H. Thorndike and Mr. H. Phillips respectively, the latter of whom later on joined Miss Bertha Moore in a duet by Lucantoni, "Il Convegno." Mr. Thorndike also sang "A Song of Hesperus," by Leslie Mayne (M.S.), for the first time. This should become a great favourite, as it is tuneful and very effective. Miss Bertha Moore was again so far successful with Algernon Lindo's "Sweet and Low" that she had to repeat it. Violin solos by Miss Shinner, and a 'cello solo by Miss Hemming, together with contributions from the Shinner Quartet completed an admirable programme. Miss Mary Carmichael accompanied with her usual taste and ability.

A concert was given by Mr. Hume Webster, at the Hack Road Lecture Hall, East, for a charitable purpose, a small but efficient band under Mr. Arthur Hervey's leadership being engaged for the occasion, with a liberal programme containing many things for many tastes, amongst which the singing of Mrs. Hume Webster of a song of her own composition, and the vocal display of that promising young singer, Miss Isabella Davies, may be singled out as features of special interest. The enterprise and energy shown in the getting up such an entertainment justly deserves the two-fold commendation of serving the interests of charity as well as affording unwonted gratification to a poorer section of our music-loving fellow creatures.

Miss Ganz gave a concert on Tuesday afternoon at Downshire House, Belgrave Square, when a large audience assembled to do honour to the accomplished daughter of an accomplished father. The lady gave, amongst others, Gounod's "Invocation à Vesta" (Polyeucte), Rossini's "Ecco quel fiero istanta," and Kjerulf's exquisite "Last Night," and was highly successful in all of them, obtaining deserved encores for two, by her artistic rendering. Mr. W. Ganz acted as solo pianist and accompanist, and was at his best in each capacity, and Mdme. Patey, Miss Lena Little, Mr. Oscar Niemann, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Foli, also assisted.

A testimonial concert was given at Kilburn Town Hall, on Wednesday last to Detective Charles Langford, who was so seriously injured recently in the discharge of his duty The chief feature of the concert, which certainly deserved success, was the singing of Mr. Richard Mackway's choir boys, who sang some popular part songs with very great taste and refinement of style. Miss Adele Myers, Miss Alice Willey, Miss Brousil, Mr. Richard Evans, and othersgave good assistance.

Mr. T. H. Bennett, organist of St. Thomas's Church, Derby, gave an organ recital at the Royal Drill Hall, Derby, on Tuesday last, which proved very successful. The programme included Handel's "Occasional Overture," Bach's Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, and Lohr's "Gondola Song," and in all of these Mr. Bennett exhibited valuable artistic qualities.

An organ recital was given on the new organ which has recently been built for the Clapton Presbyterian Church, by Mr. Henry Easun, who gave clever and spirited performances of, amongst other things, Wely's Offertore in G, Bach's Fugue in G minor, Batiste's Offertoire in A flat, and was assisted by Madame Florence Landergan, as the vocalist, and Mr. H. Landergan, as solo violin.

Mdme. Madeline Hardy gave a concert at Willis's Rooms, on Saturday last, when a programme of considerable interest was performed, the concert giver herself being especially successful in all her songs. She was assisted by Miss Eleanor Rees, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mdme. Clara Eissler, the latter lady's harp solos being played with great delicacy.

PROVINCIAL.

BRISTOL.—On the evening of the 8th and afternoon of the 9th inst. two special musical services on a festival scale were given in our Cathedral, to commemorate the completion of the sacred edifice Partial completion would have been a better term, as a great deal still remains to be done before one of the mother churches of our dual diocese can be called completed. The two works selected to supply the place of the anthem at these two services were "Israel in Egypt," and "Elijah." As already hinted at, everything connected with the execution of these two works was on festival lines. Thus there was a band and chorus of 700, for whose accommodation a spacious orchestra had been erected at the west end of the Cathedral, and principal artists of such well known excellence as Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Santley, had been engaged, with whom Miss Marie Gane, Mrs. Probert Goodwin, Mrs. Bailey, Mr. Thomas, and Mr. Warlock, local vocalists of acknowledged ability, were associated. Of the work done by band and chorus it would be difficult to speak in terms of too high praise. In "Israel in Egypt" notably did the chorus excel, and such well-known numbers as "The Hailstone" chorus, and "The horse and his rider," produced even more than their ordinary effect. In the "Elijah," again the chorus did excellent work, in fact it is not saying too much to sum up the efforts of the chorus at these two services, in the verdict that finer choral singing has never been heard in Bristol. To the band, which was under the most able leadership of Mr. Charrington, likewise more than the usual meed of praise is to be awarded, especially for their rendering of the accompaniments in the "Elijah." I have never heard them played with greater delicacy. Of the principal singers there is no need to say much, as they one and all performed familiar work in a familiar way, and what that means all musical amateurs know full well. It remains to be added that the greatest possible praise is due to the Conductor, Mr. George Riseley, the talented organist of our Cathedral. The performance of both "Israel in Egypt" and "Elijah" bore unmistakable marks of the masterhand that had guided their preparation, and the now undoubted great musical success of these two special services gives Mr. George Riseley an honourable place in the foremost rank of English conductors. It only remains to be added that the admirable way in which the stewards did their work is worthy of more than a passing word of commendation, and might serve as a pattern for more than one Festival Centre I wot of. The musical season is now over here, and at the best has been a bad one—artistically; and now we shall hear no music till October, when the Triennial Festival will take place. It may interest your readers to peruse the following list of works selected for performance: "Elijah," "Messiah," Cherubini's 4th Mass, "The Rose of Sharon," "The Golden Legend," Act I. of Gluck's "Iphigenia," Introduction and closing scene to "Tristan und Isolde," "Romeo and Juliet" (Berlioz), besides various orchestral excerpts from the works of Beethoven, Wagner, Gounod, and Dvoràk. The principal singers engaged are Mesdames Albani, Williams, Trebelli, Patey, Belle Cole, and Messrs. Lloyd, Banks, Watkin Mills, and Santley. The choir will number 362, and the orchestra will be the body of instrumentalists associated with the name of Sir Charles Halé, who will of course conduct.—F. F. M.

ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS.

You are kindly requested to write for Ainsworth's "New Patent Organ Pedal Combination List." Ainsworth's "New Patent" is perfectly unique and may be combined easily with any Piano. It is the only one which may be safely combined with any Piano without deteriorating the instrument. Having put down at my works two engines and machinery of the most desirable kind, I am now supplying my goods at a price which enables every organist and organ student to have always ready for use in his Studio an

ORGAN PEDAL PIANO,

AFFORDING PERFECTLY UNIQUE PEDAL PRACTICE.

84, Sheen Park, Richmond.

DEAR SIR,—I have deferred writing to comment upon your Pedals and Action now attached to my pianoforte until I could satisfy myself of their utility and efficiency. I can now conscientiously say that they more than fulfil all my anticipations. Although I am no carpenter, aided by your lucid diagram I had little difficulty in attaching them myself, and it is impossible to over-estimate the comfort they give to me or to conceive the saving of time one experiences in one's own room.—Believe me, yours truly,

BURNHAM HORNER, F.R. Hist.S.

To Mr. Mr. Ainsworth.

DEAR SIR,—It gives me great pleasure to bear testimony to the perfection of your Invention. I am more than satisfied with your Patent Action and Organ Pedals, and consider them worth double the money. Organists and organ students who desire to improve in the Art of Pedalling, which is so essential to a good organist, will do well to procure a set. I have seen no Action half so effective, and one can sit at the Piano and play, "Fixed in his everlasting seat," or any other organ music, or organ arrangement with the greatest pleasure. The touch of pedals could not be better, and the action is as you say, "Absolutely free from annoyances." They cannot be too highly recommended, as by their use, rapid progress is certain.—Believe me, sincerely yours,

I. B. Thornton,
Organist, Birstall, Leeds.

Cologne, July 16th, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have much pleasure in informing you that your Pedals have given the fullest satisfaction. I have them combined with my practice Piano. Many of my musical friends who have seen them, as well as my organ pupils, are quite delighted with them; and I must acknowledge that I have never met with any Pedals so noiseless and pleasant to play upon as yours. The Action I consider durable, and of very good workmanship. Every organist who desires to perfect his playing will welcome your invention. I can recommend your goods in every respect.—Yours truly,

HERR J. RODENKIRCHEN.

To John Ainsworth, Esq. Organist, The Cathedral, Cologne, Germany.

TOOLS.—In order to facilite the attachment, a complete set of tools are sent (four in number) each one marked for its particular use. By the use of these tools, and following carefully the directions, ANY ONE can make a really good attachment.

Facts and Comments.

An editor's life is not a happy one. Like the Mayor of Pevensey, in the old story, he is after all "but a man," and at intervals likes to take a little holiday, to listen to the merry village chimes, and forget that such places as St. James's Hall and Covent Garden exist anywhere out of a nightmare. Let him do so at his peril! His journal will reach him in his quiet, rural retreat in due course of post, and this, or something like this, he will see. In one page he finds himself, to his utmost horror, patted on the back by a reviewer, who, with more goodwill than tact or discretion, praises the wretched editor in his own paper for some piece of work which he is said to have done in an "admirable manner." "Save me from my friends," he sententiously remarks, and reads on to find that one of the young lions of his staff has been to a conversazione, or musical party, and having spent "an exceedingly pleasant evening," thinks that so interesting a fact is worthy of permanent record. Later on he finds that another young man, who has been permitted to try his hand at "miscellaneous concerts," has turned the brother of a charming and well-known pianist into her father. After this the poor editor gives it up, "and on that day I read therein no more," he murmurs faintly, vaguely recollecting a famous line in Dante, and goes sadly on his way.

We regret to hear of the death of Mr. Edmund Gurney, who died at Brighton, last week, in consequence of an overdose of chloroform, incautiously taken to cure obstinate sleeplessness and neuralgia. Mr. Gurney was a Cambridge man, and a Fellow of Trinity, and wrote a voluminous work on the "Power of Sound," in which he endeavoured to apply the philosophy of Herbert Spencer to music. The book is far from being a good one, but English works bringing any kind of thought to bear upon the philosophy of music are so rare, that an occasional glance at Mr. Gurney's pages might not be inadvisable for the young student, were it only to see how such things ought not to be done. Latterly Mr. Gurney had left music for the occult sciences, and he was one of the founders and joint secretary of the so-called Psychical Research Society.

A leading professor of the violin recently mentioned the curious fact that out of twenty-seven pupils at one of our great music-schools, twenty-one are ladies, while at another only one out of thirteen pupils belongs to the sterner sex. Dr. Von Bülow is in the habit of railing at petticoat pianists. If he lives long enough, he may perhaps have to conduct a band of smiling petticoat violinists, which may soften the heart of the irate Doctor.

Mr. De Lara has finished a long Cantata for chorus, orchestra, and soli, on the subject of Sir Edwin Arnold's "Light of Asia." It is an ambitious effort, and will surprise those who know Mr. De Lara only from his songs.

The competition for the Parepa Rosa Gold Medal took place on Monday. The examiners were Mr. Barton M'Guckin, Mr. Carl Rosa, and Mr. Alfred Blume (chairman). There were 31 candidates. The prize was awarded to Kate Norman.

Mr. Thomas Barker, the young harpist, whose performances are so well and deservedly remembered in London, has just returned from a tour in America, where he seems to have met with a success not less distinguished than that which he achieved in England. Mr. Barker, it will also be remembered, has a brother who, although much his junior, is not a less promising performer on the harp, and who has accompanied Mr. Frederic Cowen on his musical mission to Australia.

The Queen has given directions that the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society shall in future be known under the style and title of the Royal Choral Society.

Things are not going well with the Prince de Chandernagore, also known as Eugène Courjon. This gentleman, besides being a Prince, is also a musical composer, and like other musical composers, for a long time found it difficult to discover a congenial interpreter of his impassioned effusions. At last he came upon such a chosen vessel in Miss Margherita Perroni. She, he declared, "was the only young lady who could play his pieces," and in order to secure her companionship and services, he called in the assistance of Hymen. In other words, he resolved upon making Margherita Perroni a Princess. Most young ladies, and most young ladies' mothers, would be delighted at such a prospect, but Matilda Perroni, an opera singer, thought otherwise. She would have none of the Prince, either as a son-in-law, or in any other capacity. In consequence, the bold musician thought of a course not uncommon in romance, but, alas, illegal in this prosaic country of ours. He abducted the young lady, and instructed his servant Nellie Deeks to find lodgings for the charmer in the romantic neighbourhood of Walham Green. Unfortunately, the young lady has not yet come to the years of discretion. She has only reached the age of sweet eighteen, although her lover somewhat ungallantly declares that she is twenty-two. These devious ways of adventure at last led the unfortunate pair to the Hammersmith Police Court, where the stern Mr. Paget presides. That worthy magistrate inquired into the Prince's circumstances, and was told that he was a landed proprietor in British India, resided in Paris, and had a house in Conningham Road. This sounds well enough, but Madame Perroni proved implacable, and Mr. Paget, adopting her view of the case, granted a remand, and refused to allow bail for the present. So the Prince remains in durance vile, where, let us hope, they will allow him a piano to pour out his grief in impassioned measures. Years hence, when Margherita Perroni, in her own inimitable manner, plays the prison song to the liberated prisoner, the pair will gaze in each other's eyes and forget past trouble in present bliss. This vision should cheer the captive Prince. By the way, what are the Prince's compositions like? Has he a spare copy on hand, and will he give us a chance of deciphering its meaning without the aid of the fair Margherita?

The Brothers De Reszke are about to sever their connection with the grand opera; they are off to the land of the almighty dollar. Their recent successes in London have attracted the attention of an enterprising American manager, and arrangements have been made for a concert-tour in the States, to extend over ten months, at the rate of 40,000 francs per month.

Rubinstein has recently been giving a series of historic recitals before the pupils of the St. Petersburg Conservatoire. The virtuoso performed no less than 1,302 pieces by 79 authors, including 10 pieces by the English composers, Bird, John Bull, Gibbons, Purcell, and Arne.

Mr. Wilhelm Ganz's morning concert will take place at Dudley House, Park Lane, on Thursday afternoon next, July 5th.

Gounod recently visited Rheims, where on Sunday last he conducted his fourth "Messe Sollennelle" at the Cathedral. The 18th of June happened to be his birthday, and passing through the Cathedral just as the infant son of a professor of the Rheims School of Medicine was being baptised, he entered the sacristy, and wrote his name at the bottom of the list of witnesses, with this addition: "Un passant, né, lui aussi, le 18 Juin—mais en 1818!"

Mr. Alfred Napoleon will give a pianoforte recital on Friday next, at Steinway Hall, when his programme will include the Appassionata Sonata, Bach's Prelude and Fugue in C sharp, and a group of compositions from the pen of the concert-giver himself, including a Prelude and Fugue in F sharp minor.

Herr von Czeke, the Hungarian violinist, announces a concert at Princes' Hall, on Tuesday afternoon next, in aid of the Gordon Boys' Home. He will be assisted by the Countess de Bremont, Madame Liebhardt, Mr. John Thomas, Mdlle Jeanne Douste, and others. Interesting features of the concert will be the performance of a dramatic scena, "Haroun Al Raschid," the setting by the Rev. F. K. Harford, of Archbishop Trench's poem, and of Elegies, by Ernst and Vieuxtemps, which will be given in memory of the late Emperor of Germany.

It is said that the Czar of Russia plays the trombone, and that while the Austrian pianist, Grunfeld, was in St. Petersburg he spent a good deal of time in accompanying the musical Emperor in his performances. After this, Nihilism becomes a little more intelligible to a musician.

Messrs. Steinway have, it is said, concluded an agreement for six years with Otto Hegner, who will appear first in New York during the winter of 1889-90.

A meeting of the subscribers to the Macfarren Scholarship was held on Saturday afternoon, June 23rd, in the Concert-room of the Royal Academy of Music, among those present being the Rev. Canon Duckworth, Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, Dr. Horace Hill (Norwich), Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Mr. John Gill, and others. Mr. Meadows White, Q.C., occupied the chair. The subscription list was announced to amount to nearly £1,430. The various resolutions as to the conditions of the scholarship were passed.

Mdlle. Otta Brönnum, the young Danish singer who was associated with Madame Albani at the opening of the Anglo-Danish Exhibition, announces a concert for next week, when she will sing in no less than six languages.

Mrs. Bartholomew's (née Kate Shackell) morning concert is fixed for Tuesday next.

HECTOR BERLIOZ AND JULES JANIN

By Andre de Ternant.

Wagner, too, found it out for himself, after the disgraceful treatment he received from the majority of the representatives of the Parisian Press when "Tannhaüser" was produced at the Grand Opéra. The Comtesse de Gasparin, one of Wagner's early admirers in France, wrote: "Jules Janin seul s'indigna, se révolta, se rangea du côté de ce vaincu du Jour, qui n'était pas encore le vainquer du lendemain. Et c'est alors que de plein cœur je lui écrivis tout droit;" "Vous êtes un brave homme!" If Janin could sympathise with an unfortunate man of genius who was comparatively unknown to him, readers need scarcely be told what must have been his sympathy for an equally unfortunate life-long friend. Oftentimes the feuilletonist assisted the needy composer with a loan when creditors, bailiffs, and other obnoxious persons were at his heels, clamouring for money, and saved the little home from the hands of the brokers, and the wife and child from being turned out into the streets. All this may not seem very romantic to relate, but it is undoubtedly true. The remuneration Janin received from the proprietors of the Journal des Débats was certainly not much in excess of that of Berlioz, but, apart from his journalistic labours on the Débats, he could always find a market for his articles and books, besides editing and writing prefaces for standard and other works, while Berlioz's musical compositions were very unremunerative; even when they were accepted by the publishers, he had to content himself with receiving an insignificant sum, hardly worth mentioning, or, more frequently, a few complimentary copies instead. This sad state of affairs of course compelled Berlioz to devote the greater part of his time to literary work. How he detested that kind of occupation he tells us over and over again, and this is a description of a writer placed in the same position as himself: "The unhappy feuilletonist, obliged to write upon everything within the domain of his feuilleton (sad domain, swamp full of locusts and toads!), desires only to finish the task imposed upon him; he has very often no opinion on the subjects about which he is compelled to discourse; they excite neither his anger nor his admiration . . . Most of my brethren know how to do this without pain, and even with a charming facility. For myself, when I set about it, I do so with an effort not less prolonged than distressing."

Jules Janin was the first critic, Edmond About once remarked, who introduced bavardage into criticism, and what Berlioz complains of, therefore, never caused him any trouble. He contributed to the Débats alone over three thousand feuilletons, and knowing the composer's repugnance for literary work, very often assisted him without receiving any renumeration whatever. He once slyly alluded to his friend's antipathy in his Semaine dramatique:—

"This very sterile week has begun well; it has commenced with Berlioz's admirable concert. Behold the serious and convinced artist! He will remain six months or ten months of the year without anyone knowing what has become of him. What becomes of him? He abandons himself to his whim of the hour: one would take him for a Bohemian, a vagabond, and a good-for-nothing fellow. From time to time, and by chance, he takes up the critical pen, and praises indiscriminately many miserable things and insupportable vanities. He says that he finds it beautiful, grand, and superb. You who know him not, listen with your mouths wide open, as long as there is wit and talent displayed; but his friends, those who know what passes in his large brain, are not duped by these eulogies. On the contrary, they follow the criticism, and want to hear his last word and what he really thinks of the masterpiece in question, before forming an opinion. . . . O! of course! he remarks, what masterpiece? Of whom are you speaking? What do you take me for? I have no connection with the other Berlioz; I am another Berlioz; I am the Berlioz who sings and weeps, and who marches on hearing the sound of an invisible orchestra, of which I am the all-powerful master. I a critic! you are mistaken. He is a changeling who uses my name without authority. It is true that the fool writes in an ingenuous and spirited manner; but he has singular admirations! I therefore hope in the future that you will not confound me with that dauber of white paper. When I write, I must have under my hand some beautiful black lines on which I can jot down my thoughts here and there, all filled with mysterious signs, for the use of the greatest instrumentalists or the most beautiful voices in existence. When I write, I object to being compelled to march on like a slave, but, on the contrary, I want to follow my own fancy, and, according to my inclination, run over the scale of sounds in the same manner as did Mozart and Beethoven. That is what I call carrying out one's ideas. But I am counselled to take up a pen and write easily, and without a pause, which might calm and amuse me. Fie upon it! What do you take me for? For Berlioz the critic, perhaps! Take me simply for Berlioz!"

It was no doubt owing to Janin's misapplied zeal and kindness, that Berlioz was held accountable for many absurd and ridiculous opinions on music and musicians for more than a quarter of a century. The criticism on the first performance of Herold's "Pré aux Clercs," at the Opéra Comique, excited considerable acrimony for many years, and Janin only acknowledged himself as the author of the misdeed shortly after Berlioz's death:—

"Certain critics have reproached Berlioz with having spoken ill of Herold and the "Pré aux Clercs." It was not Berlioz, it was somebody else—an ignorant youth, who, in those days, believed in nothing, and who, in a wretched article, maltreated the masterpiece of Herold. This repentance will last as long as his life. The name of this ignorant being, I am ashamed to say, is Jules Janin." After the "Pré aux Clercs" incident Janin was a little more cautious in his dealings with music and musicians, and when Berlioz was absent on his musical travels, d'Ortigue, or some other critic, was temporarily engaged to fill the vacancy. But at times, even when in Paris, Berlioz, either from idleness or want of sympathy with certain composers, especially of comic operas, gave them a wide berth when he had the opportunity. In two amusing chapters in the "Soirées de l'Orchestre," he gives us an account of the method he employed on such occasions.

Janin, who always managed to write brilliant columns on the most insignificant theatrical trifles, could not understand the musician's silence, and he never failed to address a few words to him, which may be read between the lines, and on one occasion he concluded his weekly feuilleton in the following manner:—

Chanson a Berlioz.
Au clair de la lune,
Mon ami Berlioz;
Apprête ta plume,
Pour écrire un mot.

Sur un Opéra-Comique, intitulé, l'Aieule, qu'on a joué depuis huit jours, et dont vous n'avez encore rien dit, paresseux!"

When Paganini sent Berlioz the handsome donation of 20,000 francs, Janin did not fail to write a glowing article about it in the Journal des Débats. But the letter he wrote to his friend is even more interesting than the feuilleton itself:—

"Dear Berlioz,—I cannot refrain from letting you know the pleasure I experienced this morning when I saw the letter and enclosure sent to you by the illustrious Paganini. I am not alluding merely to you or to the money, which will give you three years' leisure, time enough to produce some masterpieces, but to the great name of Beethoven, by which he hails you. How nobly it gives the lie to those petty spirits, male and female, who refuse to recognise your "Cellini" as the brother of "Fidelio." All praise to Paganini—the praise his good action deserves; let him be blameless for all time. He has shown himself great and generous towards you—more generous than the kings, ministers, and even artists, who are the true kings of the world in Europe. He has supported you with his approbation and his purse; now, more than ever, is it incumbent on us to praise the great musician, who holds out his hand to you. Dear Berlioz, I embrace you affectionately in all the joy of my heart."

BEETHOVEN'S REMAINS.

'Curst be he who moves these bones," one is inclined to say with Shakespeare, on reading of the transfer of Beethoven's hallowed remains from the Währing graveyard to the new central cemetery of Vienna at Simmering. Modern civilisation advances in Vienna as elsewhere, and the houses of the living encroach on the dwellings of the dead. So the remains of Beethoven, in the once suburban God's Acre of Währing, have had to be removed from their resting-place, and those of Schubert, who, by his own desire, was buried by the side of the great master, will soon follow. Gorgeous monuments will be erected to them. But what are these compared with the recollections attaching to the simple stone where Schumann found the steel pen which he treasured and reserved for his most inspired thoughts? We have extracted a description of the ceremony, and of the unseemly scenes which took place at the open grave, from the accounts of various English correspondents in Vienna.

Beethoven's remains, writes one of these gentlemen, have not lain undisturbed since their first interment, for in 1863 some of his admirers, having subscribed to place a monument over his grave, obtained leave to transfer his body from the wooden coffin in which it had been buried into a new coffin of zinc. Beethoven was, as is well known, deaf during the greater part of his life, and at his death a distinguished anatomist of the period, Professor Wagner, was allowed to amputate his ears, with the whole of the aural cavities, in order to investigate the causes of the deafness. The ears were placed in two glass jars full of spirits of wine. But Wagner died before he had finished his examination of them, and soon afterwards the jars mysteriously disappeared. The story goes that they were bought of Wagner's servant by an English doctor, and removed to England. According to another account, they are in Paris.

The exhumation took place on Thursday of last week, in the presence of a few persons, chiefly officials. At four o'clock the heavy flagstone that covered the grave was raised, revealing at the bottom the zinc coffin, with a faded laurel crown upon it, and a handful of ashes, which had been thrown down by the priest who officiated at the second burial twenty-five years ago. All heads were bared as the coffin was lifted and placed on a settle, where the metal lid was at once prised open and removed. The skeleton then became exposed to view. The cranium had become detached from the face of the skull, and one of the bystanders took it up in his hand. It looked unusually large. The entire lower row of teeth was complete, and very fine, strong teeth they were, but all the front teeth of the upper row had fallen out. The leg bones were long; the hands had quite crumbled into dust.

The skeleton remained exposed for less than ten minutes but already a gentleman who held a portable camera had taken a photograph, while another gentleman, who belongs to an anthropological society, entered into an altercation with the officials, who refused to let him take some measurements and a plaster cast of the skull. The materials for a plaster cast were all at hand in a carpet bag, and the anthropologist looked deeply disgusted at having to walk away with them unused. Concerning this scandalous scene, another correspondent says:—A painful incident in connection with the removal of the remains from the Währing Cemetery was a quarrel between the authorities and certain persons who desired to make an anthropometrical examination of Beethoven's skull. This ultimately was allowed; but I regret to say that, in some as yet unexplained manner, the skull was nearly broken in two, and two of the teeth—all of which were well preserved—disappeared, having, no doubt, been stolen.

The lid having been replaced, the coffin was transferred to an iron shell, and slowly borne towards the chapel of the cemetery. The officials and other persons present followed in a procession, two and two. The public had been kept out of the cemetery, but by this time there was a crowd of faces peering through the gates.

The remains were removed on Friday to the central cemetery of Vienna at Simmering. Thousands of persons thronged the streets to watch the imposing funeral procession, and all along the route, which was more than five miles in length, the street gas-lamps were lighted. The hearse was drawn by eight horses, and was followed by two cars loaded with floral tributes. Behind these came a seemingly endless line of carriages, containing all the celebrities of the musical world in Vienna, and deputations from a very large number of instrumental and choral societies. The funeral service was performed at the cemetery by the Coadjutor to the Archbishop of Vienna, this being the third service which has been solemnised over the great composer's remains. The coffin was then laid in what will probably be its last resting-place, near to the graves which had been prepared for Mozart and Schubert. These are in a portion of the cemetery which has been reserved for the illustrious dead.

We do not question the sincerity of the motives which prompted the ceremonies thus described, but it is impossible not to feel regret at this disturbance of the last rest of one who, in life, had so little. The best way of showing devotion to the master is, after all, not by erecting monuments to him whose memory is immortal, but rather by loyalty to his aims and care for his work.

ANGLO-ITALIANS.

To the Editor of THE MUSICAL WORLD

SIR,—I was struck by the appropriateness of giving an Italian concert at the Italian Exhibition, and by no means unprepared, under the circumstances, to find in the programme, besides familiar names, others not hitherto so well known in this country. But when I first opened the bill of fare those names, I confess, caused me some bewilderment. In the palmy days last year of Buffalo Bill, Mexican Joe, and similar ethnological diversions, rumour darkly hinted, I know not with how much correctness, that if—to travesty Napoleon's well-known mot—you scratched a noble savage you would be likely, in some cases, to find an equally noble specimen from the Emerald Isle or from Whitechapel. Now—dismissing all notion of scratching, as one from which the imagination simply recoils in the present case—I want to ask, is it, is it just possible that the Signora Sara Palma may, on some occasions, be known to her friends as Mrs. Sarah Palmer; and that Signorina Jenny Dickerson's acquaintance with the Sunny South may date from a time more recent than that of her birth? I hazard the question in all ignorance and all deference; and certainly this suggested readiness on the part of an English amateur to recognise in two lady vocalists two fellow countrywomen, cannot possibly be construed in any uncomplimentary sense.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

PUZZLED.

THE CHILDREN'S ORCHESTRA.

Few prettier sights perhaps than that afforded by the "Children's Orchestra," are seen than when this band of juvenile musicians gather on the platform of Westminster Town Hall. To Mr. Percy Armytage belongs the honour of having started and organised the orchestra. It is composed entirely of dainty maidens, belonging to what Mr. Harry Furniss calls the "baby blackleg" school, and dear to Sir John Millais' heart, under the age of 17. Here are violinists without number, violoncellists, and even youthful performers on the unwieldy but indispensible double-bass, trumpeters there are, and an amazonian drummer. Judged from a high musical standpoint, perhaps, the performance leaves something to be desired, if only in the matter of too much drum. Considered, however, as a children's orchestra, Mr. Armytage, the conductor, is to be heartily congratulated on the excellence of his band, and when their barque is fairly launched in peaceful waters, the less noisy portion of the orchestra is thoroughly capable of discoursing sweet music, and the good work which is being done by this children's orchestra, during the little more than two years that it has been in existence, can be gauged in some measure by the fact that the profits of the performances have already exceeded £1,000, and this useful sum has been devoted to the support of children's charities. The president, moreover, H.R.H. the Princess Mary Adelaide, is not only content to adorn the programmes with her name, but takes a great personal interest in the well-being of the orchestra. Every member is chosen by a committee of election, which includes the Lady William Lennox, Lady Stewart, Mrs. Spencer Chapman, Mrs. Frederick Cook, Mrs. William Candy, Mrs. Archibald Milman, Mrs. Walter Stopford, and Mrs. Alt. The rules are framed in the spirit of generous despotism, and for those scions of a noble house who find their musical taste lacking an outlet for its expression outside the nursery walls, we cannot do better than recommend them to add their support to Mr. Armytage's admirable scheme, and join his "Children's Orchestra."

ART IN CHURCH.

Writing in the Cleveland Musical Art Journal, U.S., Mr. F. Norman Adams observes:—

"Accepting the fact, that the utilizing of art in the church is something more than to please, we realize forcibly the paramount importance and attention that art demands when it is associated with our religious services, and becomes a powerful exponent of our highest thoughts and feelings. Church Music should be consistent with the religious service, whatever ritual may be employed.

"To neglect such an art, whose mission is so clear, is derogatory, because our great musical masterpieces are the outpourings of great spirits. We are all quite unable to express through any language of words what we experience and feel, mentally and morally, day by day in our lives, and here enters a grand opportunity for art to become the channel of expression which words can not accomplish. In our religious services the singing of hymns alone are totally inadequate to meet the requirements of the moment, when our innermost self craves to express its highest feeling. At this moment something more is ardently desired, longed for, and imperatively demanded for expression, which hymns cannot fulfil. A musical masterpiece is equal to such a demand and can appeal directly to the psychological part of our nature, and is able to express what the multitudes cannot in their language of words find to utter. An art which has such great capabilities and of such vast resources demands our deepest sympathy and respect. The cultivation of those whose duty is to become the exponents (vocally and instrumentally) of such an art should be most unflinchingly attended to and supported, and looked upon in its real light as a most necessary accessory to our daily lives, as having a definite purpose and influence, and as a work which produces one hundred fold. It is the bounden duty of congregations to support an efficient musical staff and not to be content with a simplicity of music which is quite inadequate to express the emotional portion of the religious service. There is no reason why we should ever fear of having too good music in their churches. Music cannot be too beautiful for any church, or of too high an order; when a composition cannot be understood it is our position to wait patiently until we do.

THE NEGLECT OF ENGLISH CHURCH MUSIC.

Of late much has been said regarding the neglect of English Church music, and the letters contributed to these columns by Professor C. Villiers Stanford and other valued correspondents appear to trace this neglect to that almost always out of place individual, the Precentor. It is only fair even to an officer who is—save as in such rare instances as the great musical authority who holds office at Hereford—almost invariably a musical dilettante and seldom a connoisseur, to say that there are causes for this neglect both within and without the cathedral walls. This does not say that there is not serious blame to be attached to the large majority of our Precentors, who, by ignorance of art, general musical incapacity, and consequently dangerous meddlesomeness, are naturally "more officious than official," and far too weak to be either serviceable encouragers or defenders of any school of music demanding for its proper understanding artistic thought and knowledge. Weakness and inaction on the part of persons of responsibility are often just as mischievous as ignorance and obstinacy; and it must be allowed, alas! that the Precentor—and for that matter a large proportion of our clergy holding responsible positions—abundantly display in musical matters all four sources of artistic error and wrong dealing; for they are as often as not by turns, consciously or unconsciously ignorant, obstinate, weak, and inactive. To return, it must be acknowledged that as our cathedral services are no longer confined to acts of worship on the part of a mere handful of persons with a taste for cathedral ritual and music and gathered into a comparatively small chancel space, something more in touch with general popular taste has become a necessity now the public claim the great churches and have filled our minsters with congregations overflowing chancel limits and often extending far down the expansive transepts and naves. The cathedral choir itself, it is now felt, must be extended and enlarged; first occasionally and probably permanently very soon.

And much of the fine old cathedral music is too delicate and recherché in character, and wanting in breadth, dramatic power, and warmth of expression for a popular taste taking its standard of sacred art from the more freely-written and fully orchestrated oratorios as heard in the concert-room. Then contrapuntal treatment does not appeal as directly to the popular mind as broad, rich masses of modern harmony; and in no department of the art does fashion exercise a more powerful influence over idiomatic tone formations than in the music assigned to solo voices. Thus the grand old services and anthems have been put aside, only for a time one may hope, by a variety of circumstances and requirements, quite as much as by the want of conservatism—to apply the word in a harmless artistic and unprejudiced manner—and trained judgment on the part of our Precentors. Indeed, our Precentors may be said to view the matter as musical amateurs, with, as someone has it, rather "less than more" instead of "more or less" culture; and so they have become, to a large extent, and, perhaps unconsciously, the exponents of popular taste as distinguished from painstaking and cultivated judgment. What seems to be wanted is a wise medium course, which, while extending a welcome to modern art, will duly preserve and present the best specimens of the great schools of the past. The all but complete neglect of our standard church composers—as boldly and clearly stated by an esteemed correspondent and eminent musician, writing as "Cathedral Organist"—is a scandal. At the same time it is satisfactory to note the earnestness in this matter of the Cambridge professor of music and other leading musicians, and to know that the Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, Dr. Mackenzie, and others are anxious to take practical steps, whereby the glories and traditions of old English church music may be preserved and better understood. Such earnestness, combined with a growing feeling in favour of placing all control over strictly musical matters in the hands of real, as distinguished from pseudo musicians, will penetrate even cathedral circles. The few bright examples the church can display of properly trained and consequently useful musical clergymen, are another source of hope, as their influence will doubtless be exercised for good and their number will be enlarged as time goes on. The real cause for present complaint is the assumption of power on the part of those who have no reasonable right to its exercise, as being unprepared by education or technical training; and linked to this, as by a logical sequence, is another grievance, the deprivation of rightful influence and control suffered by our organists as skilled and duly prepared specialists. E. H. T.

ORGAN RENDERING OF ORCHESTRAL ACCOMPANIMENTS.

II.

In dealing with this subject it may be well to say that the suggestions to be offered are with a conditional understanding that the organist is engaged in representing the orchestral accompaniments, unfettered by as few responsibilities as possible in the way of supporting the choir apart from such support as the score itself supplies; and that the singers are sufficiently reliable, adequately trained, and most probably are singing under the bâton of a capable conductor. But it must not be overlooked that the cold, often unsympathetic, and fixed tones of the organ form a very indifferent support to voices as compared to that supplied by the inspiring, living, and varied tones of the orchestra. This remark leads to the broad question, ought choral works originally scored for orchestra to be attempted with only organ accompaniment? For, putting aside loss of instrumental individual effects, voice parts intended to be accompanied by orchestra often range higher than they would in music originally destined for church use with organ only. One might wander into a field of speculation regarding the possible creation of a distinct school of church oratorio music, built upon admirable works coming under this denomination already in existence. To return, it is clear that care and tact in the support of voices, especially in the case of choirs of men and boys, must remain a duty of the organist engaged in rendering orchestral accompaniments on the organ. The first business of the organ-player called upon to do such work, would be that of finding organic equivalents for the most constantly employed combinations and mannerisms of the orchestra. These organic representations would have to include eight feet effects mostly from flue pipes, which could be used for the various expressions of the string mass from soft to loud tone quantities; general effects in harmony of wood wind; and in dealing with the more modern scores, the use of the brass family in harmony would also have to be catalogued by the organ-player, as on the list of his effects. Various intermingled orchestral sounds would also call for due consideration. Then some attention would be demanded in the way of securing something like equivalent solo effects; these not by any means being always attained by such representatives as the stops named after given instruments would seem to promise.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE RENAISSANCE ON MUSIC.

A lecture delivered before the College of Organists by MORTON LATHAM, ESQ., M.A., Mus.Bac.

Every art is affected by the habits of thought with which the artists themselves are surrounded. Music has been too frequently regarded as an art, sui generis, so utterly distinct from all other arts that it has been supposed to stand uninfluenced by them and itself uninfluencing them; music has, in fact, been treated as if it had a quite distinct and separate existence, as if, in short, it belonged to a different life altogether.

In a former lecture at this college, I have endeavoured to show how wrong a view this is, and, incidentally, that it not improbably results from ignorance of music in its true artistic nature by the general world, who can understand even more of a picture which perhaps recalls a scene with which they are familiar than they can of music, which recalls only the emotions to which the scene gave birth, and which, therefore, can only touch those who are capable of feeling emotion. Hence it is necessary that all comparative work in which a due place is to be given to music should be done by musicians themselves.

And why have musicians been guilty of shortcomings, as they certainly have been, in performing this part of their duty. I can but suggest this reason. A painter can only work by daylight, and the hours of evening and winter are naturally largely devoted to general cultivation which is always likely to lean in the direction of comparative study. The claims on the time of the professional musician are far greater, from the very fact that he can work by any light. Teaching or rehearsing in the day time, performing at night, and only able to snatch a few occasional hours for his own higher work in composition, there is little time left for him, whose profession is also his means of livelihood, to study the wider art circle, so as to be able to form a broad, comparative view of the place occupied by his own art in the greater moulding of art throughout the world; and thus he runs the risk of becoming narrow. This must, I think, be the explanation.

One thing which has tended to separate music from other arts is that it is generally the last to be consciously influenced by new ideas, and this partly results from the circumstances to which I have just referred, which tend to separate musicians from other artists. It also partly results from the strong association of music with the church.

In all matters, church influence has, at all times, and in all countries, been invariably a conservative influence, and in nothing is this better seen than in music. All the great changes in music have invariably had their commencement in secular and not in religious art. For instance, the use of the modern scale was common in popular music long before it was admitted to the services of the church; the use of instrumental accompaniments similarly found its way last into compositions for the church; and the service of the church is the last place to which we should look for any technical novelties of harmony or construction.

That this conservative influence is good, there can be no doubt. It is certainly desirable before any novelty is consecrated by the church that its merit should be proved by experiment in secular work. But the fact remains, that as a natural consequence, music, which is the art most intimately associated with the service of the church, is always the last to be affected by the changing thought of each successive generation. Thus ignorance of music as an art by the uninitiated, narrowness of a large number of musicians, and the conservative influence of the church, have all tended to dissociate music from the sister arts.

All people are perfectly aware of the difference between Gothic architecture and the classical architecture revived in the renaissance. Most people are conversant with the change which took place at the same time and under the same influences in painting. Those who are well read are able to appreciate a similar change in literature. But few people, even among musicians, seem to appreciate that music was equally influenced by the same causes.

I have said that music is generally the last of the arts to be affected by new ideas; and this was certainly the case at the time of the renaissance. The revival of classical feeling had completed the revolution in literature, in architecture, and in painting before musicians were conscious of its influence on their own art.

In considering the influence of the renaissance on music, it is desirable to divide the matter into two heads, first to see how music was affected by the renaissance unconsciously at a time when the other arts were consciously adopting its maxims, and secondly, to consider how, later, when the change of ideas had been completed in the sister arts, a similar change was deliberately and consciously made by musicians in their own domain.

The most complete parallel that I know to the unconscious —or I should rather say semi-conscious—influence of the renaissance on music is to be found in architecture, and especially in the architecture of the north of Europe. Gothic architecture had never taken the same vigorous root in Italy which it did in the North, and it therefore did not offer the same obstruction to the violent change effected by the renaissance. The change in the architecture of Italy was therefore almost sudden and complete. But in England there was a long transition period, in which were erected those exquisite, late Elizabethan and early Jacobean, buildings which are, in general outline, Gothic in feeling, but, in ornamental details, renaissance in expression.

It was at the time when these buildings were being erected in England that the absolute conscious change in music took place in Italy, which then reigned supreme, far before all countries in every kind of cultivation. We may fix the date exactly in the year 1,600; that is about a century after the change had made itself generally felt in every other art.

But let us look at one or two acts of individual musicians in the century preceding 1,600, in which, to borrow the parallel from architecture, the general outline was still Gothic, while, in details of expression, renaissance sentiment was admitted.

Venice, in the sixteenth century, was a city standing by itself, apart from the jealousies of the republics of the north of Italy, and uninfluenced by the disputes of rival Princes, claiming for itself complete independence in all matters, almost even in religious discipline. It was a city inhabited by wealthy merchants, who, from the nature of its position, practically lived their whole lives in the city, and who, unable to retire to the quiet refreshment of country life in villas near the city, like Lorenzo de Medici to his retreat at Careggi, outside Florence, and not having the costly luxury of large landed estates, naturally spent their wealth in the erection of gorgeous palaces in the city itself.

The particular direction which this expenditure took was colour. Inspired by the gorgeous sunsets reflected in the waters of the lagoon, the Venetians naturally adopted the richest coloured marbles for their buildings. This again influenced the painters of the renaissance, the Venetian school being essentially the school of colour. Burnet, in his "Practical Hints on Light and Shade in Painting," speaks of the relief, harmony, and breadth found in the best pictures of the Venetian school; and then, still dealing with the same subject, he quotes the following words from Sir Joshua Reynolds:—

"Titian, Paul Veronese, and Tintoretto were among the first painters who reduced to a system what was before practised without any fixed principle, and consequently neglected occasionally."

And elsewhere in his "Essay on the Education of the Eye," Burnet says:—

"The inventions of Paul Veronese, Tintoretto, and others of the Venetian school, please and captivate all beholders, from their harmony of light and shade, and their beautiful and gorgeous arrangement of splendid colour."

"I have said that church music ought not to suffer from haphazard construction. If it is allowed to the composer to avail himself of all the best known means of expression, whether of solo voices, singly, or combined, or chorus, with what care should he enter upon his task, that he use only such combinations as shall best illustrate the text and edify the congregation. Too much of the so-called sacred music of the day is not worthy of the name, when we consider the vast number of flimsy productions which are published without number, for the most part written for the conventional quartet choir; these ephemeral compositions are for the most part fragmentary in their structure, ill-adjusted, chaotic, 'without form and void,' seemingly written only with a view to afford soloists an opportunity to illustrate themselves. They are to church music in its best estate as a cheap building done in carpenter's Gothic is to such a monument as York Minster, or Durham Cathedral. Contrast such music for a moment to the music of most of the best English church music writers. Perhaps no better example of music, written according to the canons of musical form, can be found than Smart's 'Te Deum' in F, which, musically considered, might almost pass for the first movement of a sonata. There is his first theme beginning with the words, 'We praise thee, O God,' the second subject in entire contrast to the words, 'When thou tookest upon thee;' and then comes the modulatory period, when the voices in unison are supplemented by a most wonderful accompaniment, carrying them on through the various key changes, till at length the return is made to the first subject in the tonic, to the words 'Day by day we magnify thee,' after which follows the conventional ending of a first movement of a sonata. Here is music that comes up to all the requirements of the text, so far as man is capable of fulfilling those requirements, and is admired no less by the learned musician than by one who is wholly ignorant of the simplest canons of musical art.

"Why should we not have a distinctively American school of church music in this country similar to that which exists in England? In England a church anthem of acknowledged merit, showing evidence of good musical workmanship, finds ready access to each and every one of the twenty-five or more cathedrals which are scattered over the country, their two daily musical services, kept up throughout the year, calling for a vast amount of music, in making up the music library of any one church, to which additions are constantly being made endorsed by the cathedral churches. An anthem is quickly taken up by the parish churches; it is sent over here to this country, where its circulation is still more extended. In the church, in Boston, where I have charge of the music, nine-tenths of the anthems, hymns, and chants used are by English composers. I met an American lately in London who had travelled extensively in Europe, and who said to me as I took my departure for the Continent: 'You will have to bid good-bye to real churchly music until you get back to London again.' And this was really so, for notwithstanding I heard some fine services in some of the larger cities yet it seemed like getting home again to return to London, go down to St. Paul's and hear the daily service once more. Of course, this feeling was, in a great measure, due to the fact that English speaking people have different ideas from their French and Italian neighbours as to what is ecclesiastic and churchly in sacred music. Without discussing this matter at greater length I cannot help thinking that the greatness of the English nation, and the position it occupies as one of the foremost nations of the world, is owing in a large measure to her distinct public recognition of religion, and especially of public worship. She can almost say of her daily evening sacrifice of prayer and praise that the sun never sets upon it.

"Of course there are many difficulties in the way of introducing true church music, and making it known and felt. It is much more difficulty to sing than the ordinary psalmody. But the greatest hindrance to the introduction of the more elaborate specimens of the true ecclesiastical school of writing have been in a great measure removed by the aid of the choir festivals, which seem to be growing more and more in favour every year. At the choir festivals by publishing the music three or six months in advance of the time when the festival is held, it can be properly studied and thoroughly learned before the general rehearsals occur, the most satisfactory results are obtained, even with the more difficult numbers, and in this way the best specimens of English church music, as well as those from other sources, are rendered with accuracy and precision, and thus each choir connected with such an organization is constantly adding to its repertoire churchly music of acknowledged merit, with the advantage of having had in common with other choirs, a thorough drilling from the general director in the matter of its proper rendition. I cannot but think that these choir festivals, if properly managed, will most satisfactorily dispose of the two questions given at the outset, 'What ought church music to be? How ought it to be rendered?' Let the committee on music for such festivals exercise great care in making their selections, always keeping in mind the material they have at hand for its production; let music, written distinctively for mixed choirs, be always sung by such choirs, and the same with regard to boy choirs. Let it be the best of its kind, whichever kind is chosen. Nor should compositions be selected for performances which are written for orchestral accompaniment, unless the orchestra is available for such accompaniment. I am well aware that some such music can be quite satisfactorily treated upon the organ, but there is a great deal of music which it is absolutely impossible for an organist to attempt to reproduce on that instrument. The beautiful violin passages which embellish so much of the sacred music of Mozart, beautiful from their very delicacy and fineness of tone of the instrument for which they were written, are ofttimes utterly spoiled when attempted on the organ, being entirely unsuited to the diapason quality of tone which predominates. Especially does such music, in addition to the quick, so-called, cross-time accompaniment, when the bass has the first count in the measure, and the chord is repeated for the others, have a tendency to degrade this noble instrument.

"Let us have music in the church with which no other associations are connected. Let it be distinctive, as I have said before. Let us not have 'Nearer my God to Thee,' sung to the melody of 'Robin Adair,' as has been done, nor 'Jesus, lover of my soul,' to the song 'When the swallows homeward fly.' If Moses was told to put his shoes from off his feet, for the place whereon he stood was holy ground, with what care should we guard our tabernacle on earth, and keep out of it any and everything that has not been consecrated wholly and entirely to sacred use. I have said very little thus far in regard to the quartet choir considered as such, for however indispensable four soloists may be, as they certainly are, in the organisation of any choir, yet I cannot think that four singers alone can adequately illustrate and set forth the musical offering of a great congregation. Such a choir does not come up to the standard to be found either in the sacred or secular field of music. No one would think of writing an opera, much less an oratorio, for four voices alone. The trained chorus is wanting to supplement them, and in church the great congregation to supplement both in one grand, united offering of praise and worship. Another question suggests itself. Should church singers be paid? The proper answer to this question can be more readily apprehended by asking another and similar one. Ought the clergy to be paid? However much we might despise that clergyman, who, if such a case were supposable, entered upon the duties of his holy office from merely mercenary considerations, yet we have the express words of scripture to the effect that they who serve at the altar shall live of the altar, and the same holds true of the singer or player who lives by his art. David said, 'I will not offer to the Lord that which costs me nothing,' and if the best of music cost money, and we have the money to avail ourselves of it, by all means secure it, and thus give unto the Lord a musical offering that may be acceptable to him, though it may cost us something in the way of self-denial at home, that we make our spiritual home on earth more glorions. But the singer should enter upon his holy office from the same motive which actuates the clergyman—from love of the art and desire to do all the good with it that it is possible for him to do. Too many hired choir singers, it is feared, look upon the matter of singing in church from merely a pecuniary point of view—so much service for so much money. Let us all look forward to that time, we trust not far distant, when each chorister shall be a devout worshipper--a member of the church—the duties of whose office are undertaken for no sordid or mercenary reasons, but from the love af God, the love of the musical art, and the benefit that may result to mankind in exciting and stimulating their devotions."

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

The last lecture of the present session was given on Tuesday last, in the form of a paper on "Some suggested modifications in Day's Harmony, to meet various objections raised against his Theory," by Dr. C. W. Pearce. The chair was taken by Dr. E. J. Hopkins, who, with Mr. C. E. Stephens, Dr. C. Vincent, and other gentlemen, took part in the proceedings. The able paper will, in due course, be placed before the reader.

THE PRECENTOR QUESTION.

To the Editor of The Organ World.

Sir,—I cannot allow the letter written to you by "J.K.," on the subject of "The Clergy and Church Music," to pass without sending a line respecting it, which I trust you may be able to insert in your next issue.

I should like to ask "J.K." in what way he thinks the bishops could provide for the better musical education of the Precentors, even if it were desirable. It is quite impossible to expect that amateurs (and Precentors could not be called anything else in music) could ever hold their own against professionals, and yet the amateurs (according to "J.K.") ought to be able to "enlighten" the professional and show him a better way of playing anthems and services if the organist's playing should not be to his taste. I should also like to ask "J. K." how he thinks things could be expected to work smoothly in our cathedrals if Precentors were the equals of organists in all musical matters. There would be continual friction. It is well-known that wherever a Precentor has had any power in the training of cathedral choirs, there has been, as a rule, contention. And can one wonder at it. Where is the professional man who could be comfortable when interfered with, and dictated to, by an amateur? and yet this is what is expected by some Precentors, as I know from my own experience. There is an old proverb, which says, "too many cooks spoil the broth," which will apply very aptly to the subject of church music.

"J. K." seems almost to think that it would be desirable to go back three or four hundred years to the time when the clergy had almost entirely in their hands knowledge of every kind. As it is impossible to do that, the wisest thing to do is to make different arrangements for altered circumstances. I state boldly my own opinion that the office of Precentor should be abolished, or, if not abolished, that the organist should be Precentor. My reason for saying this is that I have found, as a rule, Precentors either quite ignorant of their duties, or, owing to the smattering of music which some of them possess, so bigoted in their musical views that there is great danger of the best class of English church music being shelved, as Dr. Stanford in his letter to you a short time ago seems to fear. I have been associated with two Precentors, who, when they were appointed, could not have made out a single week's list of services and anthems if they had not had the old lists of their predecessors to guide them. Yet it is to such men the power is entrusted of choosing new music and shelving any old music they do not like (too often the best). When I state that not a single bar of Purcell's music is sung in our cathedral; that such anthems as "Hosanna," Gibbons; "Bow thine ear," Byrd; "I was in the spirit," and "I beheld, and lo," Blow; "Call to remembrance," Battishill; "Praise the Lord, O my soul," "Sing praises," and "Cry aloud," Croft; and a considerable number of other anthems equally fine, have been allowed to drop out of use, it will seem to most Cathedral organists that a Precentor cannot have much musical taste.

I could, if it were not intruding too much upon your space, reveal some musical atrocities committed by Precentors within my own knowledge that would astonish anyone who can appreciate the good old style of English church music. I enclose my card.—Yours faithfully,

June 21, 1888. A Cathedral Organist.

SIR JOHN STAINER.

By an opportune arrangement, it is proposed to give a dinner and present an address to Sir John Stainer, in recognition of distinguished services to the art of music. The date will, it is understood, be Tuesday, July 17, and the dinner will take place at the Hôtel Mètropole. The general committee includes Lord Herschell, Lord Charles Bruce, Lord Thring, the Right Hon. A. J. Mundella, M.P., the Hon. Spencer Lyttleton, Mr. W. H. Gladstone, M.P., Mr. Stuart Wortley, M.P., Colonel the Hon. W. Colville, Sir George Grove, Sir Arthur Sullivan, the Rev. Canon Gregory, the Rev. Canon Scott Holland, the Rev. Flood Jones, the Rev. W. H. Milman, the Rev. W. Russell, the Rev. Dr. Troutbeck, J. Barnby Esq., J. F. Bridge Esq., Mus. Doc., T. Chappell Esq., Arthur Coleridge Esq., W. H. Cummings Esq., Otto Goldschmidt Esq., E. W. Hamilton Esq., H. Weist Hill Esq., Henry Leslie Esq., A. H. Littleton Esq., A. C. Mackenzie Esq., Mus. Doc., G. C. Martin Esq., Mus. Doc. Charles Morley Esq., W. Parratt Esq., Mus. Bac., C. Steggall Esq., Mus. Doc., E. H. Turpin Esq., F. Walker Esq., A. Chappell Esq., W. G. Cusins Esq., W. A. Barrett Esq., Mus. Bac., R. R. Holmes Esq., F.S.A., Prof. C. Villiers Stanford Mus. Doc., Buxton Morrish Esq., C. E. Stephens Esq., M. E. Wesley Esq., Prof. J. Ella, with power to add to their number. The Executive Committee consists of the following gentlemen:—Lord Charles Bruce, the Hon. Spencer Lyttleton, W. H. Gladstone, the Rev. Canon Scott Holland, J. F. Bridge, Mus. Doc.; Otto Goldschmidt, A. J. Littleton, hon. treasurer, and E. H. Turpin, hon. secretary. This representative list abundantly displays the wide sympathy and good-will expressed towards Sir John Stainer, by the clergy, by legislators, University and musical men, and directly represents St. Paul's Cathedral, Westminster Abbey, the Royal Academy of Music, the College of Organists, and the Guildhall School of Music. The event promises to be one of exceptional interest, as it will be a practical testimony to the worth of the esteemed and distinguished man in whose honour it is to take place. The name of the chairman and other particulars will be duly made known. The price of the tickets, it is expected, will be about 25s. Application for these should be made at an early date.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS' CALENDAR.

On Tuesday next, July 3rd, the library will be opened from 7 to 10. July 17th, 18th, 19th, F.C.O. Examination; July 20th, Diploma Distribution; July 24th, 25th, 26th, A.C.O. Examination; July 27th, Diploma Distribution. Candidates should send in their names, with fees, on or before July 10th. Every information may be obtained on application. Other arrangements and particulars will be duly announced.

THE BOLOGNA EXHIBITION.

BOLOGNA, June 25.

In 1875 a handsome public garden, named after the Queen Margherita, was laid out just outside the time-worn walls of Bologna, and here the provincial exhibition of Emilia has taken up its temporary abode. The most important building, situated on a slight eminence facing the principal entrance, is that dedicated to the musical part of the exhibition, which is international, and many most interesting curiosities do we find in it. On the ground floor are the saloons, filled with all kinds of modern instruments, and the room dedicated to the memory of Donizetti, containing MSS., his piano, his portrait, the chair on which he died, the table on which he composed, the likeness of his first master, Simone Mayer, photographs of his birthplace, and other relics.

Berlin, Brussels, Antwerp, Milan, Rome, Venice, Bologna, have contributed rare objects to the collection of ancient musical instruments contained in the gallery set apart for this branch. From Berlin, Ernest Mendelssohn sends the MSS. of Beethoven's overture "Fidelio;" Haydn's symphony in E flat, Mendelssohn's 114th Psalm, and the choruses to Œdipus, together with Mozart's "Serraglio." Signora Succi, of Bologna, lends letters and MSS. of Paganini, Lulli, Beethoven, Weber, Schumann, Haydn, Bellini, Zingarelli, Carlo Bach, Chopin, Wagner; a cantata for bass voice, L'oro, by Antonio Caldara, 1763; and the following quaint lines by Salieri, 1750.

"Che mais sarebbe
  Sez' arte il mondo?
Confusione
  Da cuna al fondo.

E per cio gridasi
  Vivan gl'artisti;
E al diavolo
  Vadan i sofisti."

In a small upright case are two Amati violins, 1602 and 1606; in another, one of eight made by Steiner in homage of the Republic of Venice, as well as a violoncello, by the same, in 1608. Austrian school—a guitar, by Stradivarius, 1679; a small harp, 1681; a very ancient lute, an English harplute of the end of last century, a mandolin, 1790; a tympanon, by Jos. Battista, 1723; a curious small spinet of thirty notes only, by Giorgius Bernerini Tridentinus, 1595. Another, rather larger, made by Pari, at Modena, 1493; a contrabass, by Amati; a beautifully inlaid Venetian guitar, 1641; a large black English horn of the seventeenth century; a spinet made in Mantua, 1545, the notes labelled A, B, C, four octaves; a violoncello by Stradivarius; a Russian bassoon of the last century; and a glicibarifono, whatever that queerly-named instrument may be; divers trombe marine, which are not trombe at all, but oblong stringed instruments, about five feet, with one very thick string; a colascione, with three strings over four feet long; an enormous wind instrument, from Antwerp, called flauto dolce basso, over six feet in length; a numerous collection of oddly-shaped Japanese instruments, presented by Queen Margherita, to the Milan Museum, in which a large Koto claims pre-eminence; in another case a kind of horn, formed of a sea snail of Brobdingnagian dimensions, was to be seen; an African monochord, with numberless strings all round, to which small shells were attached; a five-tubed flute, said to be the only example known, lent by the Civic Museum, Bologna; and, to conclude with a small specimen, a sordino, a most quaint-shaped baby fiddle, with its little bow about twelve inches long. Among the books sent by Rome Milan, &c., the most remarkable are an illuminated Gradual, first half of fifteenth century; a Missal, 1400; a Salterio annuo, made for the Duke of Urbino, 1471. In the centre of the frontispiece the Saviour, in a blue robe, with wounds in his hands and feet, is sitting by the Father, in a red robe; over them hovers a large dove with nimbus; in the background is a landscape with trees resembling green fungi; but the faces of the figures are not badly done; an antifonario, 1678, Salterio, thirteenth century; a very fine Carthusian Missal, 1503; six fugues in one, dissimilar in mode and tone, by Ramonati; a hand with notes and scales printed on the palm in a manual, by Bonaventura of Brescia; Purcell's Orpheus Britannicus, 1706; Thomas Mace's Musik's Monument; second part, Lute made easy, a dialogue between the author and the lute in verse—"The world is grown so slight, full of new fangles, and take their chief delight in jingle-jangles, with fiddle noises, pipes of St. Bartholomew," &c., 1676. Dedicated to the Queen of Sweden in 1658, by Marazzoli, is Vita umana ossia Trionfo della Pietà, musical drama; on the frontispiece is engraved the triumph of pity and the girandola at Castle St. Angelo; next this is Quagliati's Carro di Fedeltà e d'Amore for five voices; Monteverde's Orfeo, 1609; a cantata by Cavaliere, called Anima e Corpo, 1600, &c.

The handsome concert-room was crowded on the 16th of June, when the first series of concerts commenced, the programme including Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, a Siciliana for strings only, by Boccherini, and Schumann's Symphony in B flat. In one of the following concerts, the veteran Sivori will take part; in another, our own Purcell's name occurs; and the three concluding concerts for this month will be devoted to Mendelssohn's "Elijah." Strange that the oratorio, most popular in England after the "Messiah," should be unknown in Italy! But so it is. We have heard during a residence of of eighteen years, only the "Messiah" and "Israel in Egypt," as well as "Judas Maccabeus," the last-named twice at Turin, by the Stefano Tempio Choral Society, conducted by the Maestro Giulio Roberti. The highest praise is due to Signor Parisini, of the Liceo Musicale, and Signor Martucci (who surely must be one of the youngest conductors of orchestra, as he is but twenty-eight) for the indefatigable manner in which they have worked up band and chorus, not only for the concerts, but for Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," lately given at the fine Teatro Comunale, with most successful result. Nouvelli was the Tristan, and Signora Cattaneo the Isolde; and so admirably did they interpret their difficult parts, that at the end of the first act they were recalled five times, together with Martucci. The lengthy lamentations of King Mark rather interfered with any great demonstration of enthusiasm in the second act, but as soon as the last note of the third had sounded a perfect hurricane of applause burst forth, and all the singers and Martucci were recalled again and again; and well did they deserve it, especially the latter, who had had nineteen rehearsals for the orchestra, and fifteen general rehearsals. Some critics who had heard the opera at Bayreuth and Munich consider that in parts the Bolognese representation surpassed those, famous though they were.

For us English, Elijah is so identified with Santley's splendid singing, that we shall feel the greatest curiosity about the singer who will impersonate the prophet in Bologna.

E. M. Stevens.

THE HANDEL FESTIVAL.

In that singular and charming book, "The Ethics of the Dust," Mr. Ruskin made some unkind remarks concerning the Crystal Palace and the monster concerts of which it is triennially the scene. The Crystal Palace itself, said Mr. Ruskin, in his own amiable way, was designed by the lower Pthah—the lower Pthah, as everyone does not know, being a second-rate Egyptian god, who represented degraded and purposeless mechanical labour. "The little Pthah, having built the place, set to work to put fine fairings on it. He painted the Nineveh bulls afresh, with the blackest eyes he could paint, and he got the angels down from Lincoln choir, and gilded their wings like the gingerbread of the old St. Catherine's Fair; and he sent for everything else he could think of. There are the casts of Niobe and her children; and the chimpanzee; and the wooden Caffres and New Zealanders; and the Shakespere House; and Le Grand Blondin, and Le Petit Blondin, and Handel; and Mozart; and no end of shops, and buns, and beer; and all the little Pthah worshippers say, never was anything so sublime!" And hearing this, one of the children who formed Mr. Ruskin's audience said, "Now, do you mean to say you never go to these Crystal Palace concerts? They're as good as can be." And this was the pregnant reply of the Sage of Brantwood. "I don't go to the thundering things with a million of bad voices in them. When I want a song, I get Julia Mannering and Lucy Bertram and Consellor Pleydell to sing, "We be three poor mariners" to me; then I've no headache next morning. But I do go to the smaller concerts when I can, and I always get a reserved seat somewhere near the orchestra, where I can see the kettle-drummer drum. You know one can't see the modulation of violinists' fingers, but one can see the vibration of the drummer's hands, and it's lovely."

It must, of course, be admitted that this passage, as is not wholly unusual with Mr. Ruskin, is greatly exaggerated; but it is none the less suggestive, and, in some measure, true. Certain is it that the chorus of to-day does not contain a million bad voices, if any. Not less certain is it that the multitudes which during the past week have been crowding the vast transept of the Crystal Palace did not come to watch the vibrations of the drummer's hand. They were drawn together to do honour to the memory of one who is justly dear to the national heart. And indeed, there are few things more wonderful in the history of art than this love of the English people towards the Caro Sassone. It is so different from the cold approval with which the public is wont to regard a great artist, and is not unworthy, as an example of high national enthusiasm, to set beside the story of the shouting procession which bore Cimabue's Madonna through the streets of Florence to the church of St. Maria Novella. And therefore, though it is possible to question whether such performances as these are entirely good, regarded purely from the artistic standpoint, it is not possible to deny that the generous love and honourable reverence which we, as a nation, delight to exhibit for the great master, are altogether creditable to the national heart, and that for this reason, if for no other, the English people do well to observe increasing fervour with the Handel festivals.

That the love of which we have spoken is in nowise abated, must have been plain to all who were present at the performances of the latest festival, which was introduced on Friday week by the rehearsal which, whatever it may be called, has always been regarded by amateurs as equal in importance and interest to any of the succeeding concerts. The programme was, as is usual on these occasions, of selections from the works named for subsequent entire performance, and the vast chorus and orchestra under Mr. Manns' able guidance had already been brought to such relative perfection that, save in one or two instances, it was not necessary to interrupt the performance. The chorus seemed, in comparison with that of the last festival, to have gained in strength and timbre, as well as in executive accuracy. The volume of sound was magnificently impressive, and led the hearer to wonder what effect would have been produced on the contemporaries who assembled at the first performance of "Mr. Handel's oratorio," when the band and chorus together numbered 525, could they have listened to the four thousand singers and players who have been giving, during the past week, to the master's works a solidity and breadth of effect of which Handel himself did not dream. For, after all, it is around the choral work that the interest of these occasions chiefly centres, not only because it is in these that Handel's power is most to be seen, but because in the sound-devouring spaces of the Crystal Palace nearly all the delicacy of solo singing is lost. Consequently, the greatest effects of the rehearsal on Friday were produced by such massive structures as the "Hallelujah" chorus, the still more massive double chorus from "Israel in Egypt," and similar pieces of writing whose impressiveness and solemnity are scarcely to be paralleled. But with what skill the chorus could render more refined effects was shown by the performances of the beautiful "Nightingale" chorus, and that, not less beautiful, "Wretched lovers," from "Acis and Galatea," the last-named especially being given with the utmost justness of expression. The soloists were Mr. Barton McGuckin, who sang "Total Eclipse" and "Waft her, Angels," with admirable taste; Madame Nordica, who won much approval by her rendering of "Hush, ye pretty warbling choir"; Madame Albani; whose chief contribution was "Angels ever bright and fair," admirably sung; Madame Trebelli, to whose lot fell somewhat unimportant airs, but who did the utmost possible with them; and Messrs. Bridson and Brereton.

According to the time-honoured custom, the festival proper opened on Monday, with the performance of the "Messiah," when the promise of the rehearsal was more than fulfilled. The slips made by the chorus and band could be counted on the fingers of one hand, and in no case were they very serious, the worst being made by the brass, which was, however, for a moment only. The breadth and massiveness of such choruses as the "Hallelujah," "All we like sheep," the final adagio of which was, in especial, given with most solemn impressiveness, and "Lift up your heads" were admirably realised by the choir. The soli were taken by Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, with whose names this masterpiece has for long been so honourably associated. Madame Albani and Mr. Lloyd had, of course, less difficulty than their colleagues in overcoming the acoustic difficulties with which soloists are faced in such a place; but the consummate art of Madame Patey and Mr. Santley was not less apparent, the latter gentleman evoking the utmost enthusiasm by the fire and spirit with which he gave "Why do the nations?" and "The trumpet shall sound." Madame Albani and Madame Patey were, perhaps, heard at their best in the solos "Come unto Him" and "He shall feed His flock," each of which was given with perfect expression. Madame Patey also sang the air "But who may abide?" Mr. Lloyd sang his solos as he alone of living tenors can sing, "Comfort ye" and "Behold and see" being especially admirable.

We are compelled by pressure on our space to postpone till our next issue notices of the final performances.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The most important operatic event of the past week has been the production, on Monday evening, of "Il Flauto Magico." Madame Trebelli and M. Edouard de Reszke had been announced in the cast, but their parts were, as a matter of fact, taken by Madame Scalchi and Signor Novara. The Pamina of the evening was Madame Minnie Hauk, who gave a very suggestive reading of the part, and sang Mozart's music throughout in her best manner. Signor Novara was distinctly successful as the High Priest, playing with much force and breadth, his rendering of "Qui Sdegno" winning him unbounded applause. Mdlle. Arnoldson sang charmingly, and looked not less charming, as Papagena; and Miss Ella Russell, as Queen of Night, attacked the difficulties of the part with much courage, and a good share of success. Signor Ravelli as Tamino, Signor Del Puente as Papageno, and Signor Rinaldini as Monostatos, were all satisfactory; while the orchestra, under the guidance of Mr. Randegger, was good throughout. It is to be regretted that Mr. Harris's fondness for ballets should have led him again to offend against the artistic proprieties by the introduction of a ballet in the present opera. Possibly the offence was not so great as on a certain former occasion, but it was none the less an offence.

"Fra Diavolo" was presented last week, with Miss Ella Russell as Zerlina, and Signor Ravelli as the brigand hero. Miss Russell sang sweetly, and acted gracefully in her part, and Signor Ravelli's reading of the rôle of the hero was very picturesque. Mdlle. Louise Lablache as the Lady Pamela sang with more then usual effectiveness. Signor Del Puente as Beppo, and Signor Novara as Giacomo, were admirably and legitimately humorous, and without the least exaggeration, while almost identical criticism applies to Signor Ciampi, who, in the part of Lord Koburg, abstained from his too common fault of stepping out of the canvas.

On Friday of last week, "Carmen" was given, when the tenth anniversary of its production in England was celebrated, and with Madame Minnie Hauk in the part with which this admirable artist is so closely identified, and Mdlle. Bauermeister, Signor Del Puente, and Signor Rinaldini, in their old parts, the performance could scarcely fail to be as good as indeed it was. Little detailed comment is needed, for all amateurs will know how these singers, with the help of a good orchestra, interpreted Bizet's opera. At the end of the third act, a gold wreath was presented to Madame Hauk as a memorial of the anniversary.

Concerts.

DR. VON BULOW'S BEETHOVEN RECITALS.

The fourth and last of these highly-interesting and instructive performances took place last Tuesday afternoon, when, as before, the cheap seats were uncomfortably crowded, and the balcony was comparatively empty. In the stalls were many musicians of note, including M. and Madame de Pachmann, Madame Norman-Neruda, Sir George Grove, Sir Charles Hallé, Mr. Prout, Mr. Dannreuther, Mr. Hartvigson, and M. Sainton. The programme consisted of only four numbers, but three of them, at least, were of the highest importance—the Sonata in A major, op. 101, the Sonata in B flat, op. 106, 33 Variations on a Waltz by Diabelli, and the posthumous Rondo known as "Rage at the loss of a penny." The two sonatas were given with the strong intellectuality and grave earnestness of style that always characterise Bülow's performances; but it was not till the variations that he showed himself in his best form and played with genuine inspiration. The title given to each variation in the programme is probably an idea of Bülow himself to bring about a more intelligent appreciation on the part of the listener, and the endeavour to give the variations a distinctive character apart from the merely cold and lifeless form is always the most remarkable feature of Bülow's variation-playing. However that may be, the titles are singularly happy, especially "Alla Leporello" for the 22nd, and "Humoreske" for the 27th variation. At the close of the arduous performance the doctor was repeatedly recalled and enthusiastically cheered. His presence is a healthful influence among us, for his vigorous, clear style is as opposed to effeminate sentimentality as it is to the too prevalent tendency to over elaboration of detail for the sake of effect.

MISCELLANEOUS.

An interesting pianoforte recital was given by Mr. E. H. Thorne, with the assistance of his well-tutored pupils, at Princes' Hall, commencing with an artistic performance by the bénéficiaire of one of Beethoven's most beautiful and effective, and, at the same time, most rarely heard earlier Sonatas, op. 10 in D (the opening theme foreshadowing the great pianoforte trio in the same key), in which the pianist displayed a crisp touch, clear execution, and a thorough grasp of the composer's meaning. Rheinberger's Duet, op. 15, for two pianofortes, although a most scholarly work, proved more interesting by reason of its comparative novelty than its melodic charm, whilst a special effect was made by Mr. Algernon Ashton's most attractive "Scottish Dances" for four hands, forming the second set of a series of English, Scottish, and Irish Dances; that is, original themes worked out with artistic purpose. Mr. Thorne likewise introduced a clever "Sonata Elegica" of his own, containing many points of interest.

M. Vladimir de Pachmann gave a pianoforte recital at St. James's Hall. Whilst most artists are apt to sober down as years go on, the inverse process appears to take place in the case of Vladimir de Pachmann. In his earlier days somewhat lacking in fire and impulse, he has become one of the most passionate performers. Added to this the finish of a technique held for a long time past almost incapable of improvement, the net result is a degree of perfection equalled by very few, and surpassed, probably, by none; even his somewhat marked demonstrativeness, objected to by some, becoming almost une qualitie, when every note is felt, with the artist's obvious desire to elicit a corresponding feeling in the listener. As a matter of fact, the audience was held spell-bound from the first bar to the last of a long recital, comprising a varied selection of pieces from Beethoven to Brahms, Rubinstein, von Bülow, F. Cowen, &c., and including the very charming set of variations composed by the artist's gifted wife, and brought out at her own recital last year. That the great pianist's appearance should be confined to one recital will be an object of regret to most present.

Mr. Harold Savery's concert, which took place last week at Steinway Hall, afforded the concert-giver an opportunity of exhibiting a baritone voice of excellent quality, to which he adds good method and intelligence. He was conspicuously successful in his renderings of Henry Parker's "The Flying Dutchman" and Marzial's "My Love is Come," which latter song, in especial, he gave with admirable spirit. He was assisted by Mrs. Dyke, whose rendering of Gounod's "Worker" was excellent; by Mdlle. de Lido, Mr. Herbert Thorndike, and others. Mr. Odell also gave some of his inimitably funny recitals.

A well and fashionably-attended concert was given by Mr. George Power on Thursday. Mr. Power was very successful in two songs by Meyer Helmund and Gounod's "If Thou Art Sleeping." Miss Louise Phillips sang with much grace and delicacy Cowen's "Snowflakes," and joined Mr. Power in Miss Carmichael's duet, "At Daybreak." Miss Marguerite Hall gave charmingly artistic renderings of Kjerulf's bright song, "On the Ling, Ho!" and "A June Song," and Marzial's "My Love Is Come" received a spirited interpretation from Mr. Alec Marsh.

The concert by the students of the Royal Academy, which had been postponed on account of the death of the Emperor of Germany, took place on Saturday evening, in St. James's Hall. A very intelligent performance of Beethoven's Quartet in C, op 59, was given by Messrs. O'Brien, Gerald Walenn, Dyson, and Allen Gill. Mr. Owen Roberts sang with considerable skill "Lohengrin's Farewell," and several compositions by the pupils were introduced, among them being songs by Mr. Frank Idle and Miss Bertha Ball.

Miss Carlotta Levy, who, as we lately announced, has but recently forsaken the study of instrumental for that of vocal music, gave a morning concert, on Tuesday last, at Steinway Hall. The young lady proved the wisdom of this step by the good use to which she put a soprano voice which, especially in its upper register, is of considerable brilliance, and her method and style are extremely good. She sang with skill and taste Goring Thomas's "Wind in the Trees," Godard's "Chanson de Florian," and Blumenthal's "Love, the Pilgrim," and was assisted by Miss Helen D'Alton, Miss Frances Harrison, Mr. J. G. Robertson, whose sweet voice won him much favour, and others.

It is rarely that two ladies have the courage to present the whole of an opera at a benefit performance, and it is with pleasure that we have to record the success of Miss Clara Leighton's and Miss Jeanne Rosse's performance of "Martha," on Saturday, June 3, at St. George's Hall. Miss Clara Leighton has had considerable experience with the Carl Rosa Company, and her pure soprano voice and clever acting have previously delighted many audiences. In the character of Lady Harriet Durham she was most successful. Miss Jeanne Rosse, who, during the past few years has been attaining fame as a platform vocalist, made, as Nancy, her "first appearance on any stage." Her voice is a powerful contralto, of very extensive compass and careful training; her personal appearance is greatly in her favour, and she acts with much animation and intelligence. When greater confidence has succeeded the nervousness consequent upon a first appearance, Miss Rosse will be a most valuable addition to our English opera companies. The part of Lionel was played by Mr. Valentine Smith, of the Carl Rosa Company, in an admirable manner. Mr. Smith was in very good voice, and his performance was, all round, an excellent one. Mr. Charles Victor was heard and seen to advantage as Plunkett. His rendering of the drinking song in the third act was especially good, and had to be repeated. Mr. Van Neuerdin took the part of Sir Tristram at the last moment, in place of Mr. H. G. Harper, who was indisposed; and Mr. J. B. Dumbell played the Sheriff. Great praise is due to the director and conductor, Mr. Henry Baker, and to both chorus and orchestra.

Miss Florence Emerson's concert, the first since her recovery from recent long and severe illness, took place last Tuesday, and her many friends and admirers were glad to find that that illness had not in any way injured the timbre of her voice. Her most interesting contributions to the programme were Donizetti's "Regnava nel silenzio," and Tosti's latest song, "We have loved," both of which were given with much charm of voice and style, and more than justified the welcome given by her audience. Miss Emerson received able assistance from Miss M. Serruys, Madame Schlüter, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. Henry Pope, and others.

Mr. James A. Bovett gave his matinée musicale in the Banqueting-Rooms, St. James's Hall, on Tuesday last. Mr. Bovett possesses a light tenor voice of good quality, which promises to be an acquisition to the concert rooms of London. He sang in a genuinely artistic way Handel's "Where'er you Walk," "Come into the Garden, Maud," and in one or two trios. The concert-giver was assisted by Mdlle. de Lido, who sang charmingly the cavatina from Bizet's, "I Pescatori"; by Miss Eleanor Rees, who gave, with her peculiar grace and purity of style, Lovett King's "Oft I wonder," and Horn's "I've been roaming;" by Miss Annie Williams, and others.

The third ballad concert of the season was given at the Alexandra Palace on Saturday, when Mr. Sims Reeves was, of course, the chief attraction to the large audience, who were delighted beyond measure with the singing of the great tenor, who gave "Macgregor's Gathering," and "Tom Bowling," much of the effect of these, however, being spoiled by the constant noise and interruptions of the people in other parts of the building. It is surely to be regretted that the direction cannot prevent this. Miss Julia Albu, Miss Helen D'Alton, and Mr. Barrington Foote also sang.

Reviews.

INSTRUMENTAL.

Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co., have published three short pieces for pianoforte by Fred. H. Cowen, the captivating qualities of which, especially when played as M. de Pachmann plays them, so immediately appealed to the audience assembled for the recital given by that popular pianist at St. James's Hall, last Saturday afternoon. Many who then heard these "Trois Morceaux" for the first time, and many more who have heard of them, will be glad of the opportunity thus afforded of making their closer acquaintance in black and white. The first number "Petite Scène de Ballet," a melody in G major and three-four time, is charming as it is original. Demanding as it does intelligent and sympathetic rendering rather than any unusual executive ability on the part of the player, this piece possesses features especially likely to attract the attention of amateurs, and is one of those little gems for the pianoforte, the demand for which so greatly exceeds the supply. Almost equally pleasing in their way are the "Romanza"—a flowing theme in E major, with florid accompaniment—and a graceful, fairylike Scherzo of gossamer lightness, in G minor, requiring a fair amount of skill for its effective rendering in the time marked.

There is sterling work in a "Suite for Pianoforte," by Francesco Berger, two of the numbers especially—"Gavotte and Musette" and "Barcarole"—making excellent pianoforte pieces when taken separately. The "Prelude," "Religioso," and "Irlandaise" are all written in musicianly style, but unequal as regards melodic interest. "Six Melodic Studies for Pianoforte," by A. de Orellana (Charles Woolhouse), as will be inferred from their title, are an attempt to combine tuneful interest with the pursuit of various technical objects, and in this the composer has been in great measure successful, although he cannot be said in all cases to have been proof against the danger—incidental to all such attempts—of being tempted to sacrifice business to pleasure. Except in so far as all pianoforte pieces may at times be made to subserve the purpose of studies, there are several here, sufficiently pleasing in themselves, which would pass very well under titles of another sort. The same publishers send a march, written with some vigour, entitled "Marche des Mousquetaries," by G. Saint George.

ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS.

You are kindly requested to write for Ainsworth's "New Patent Organ Pedal Combination List." Ainsworth's "New Patent" is perfectly unique and may be combined easily with any Piano. It is the only one which may be safely combined with any Piano without deteriorating the instrument. Having put down at my works two engines and machinery of the most desirable kind, I am now supplying my goods at a price which enables every organist and organ student to have always ready for use in his Studio an

ORGAN PEDAL PIANO,

Affording Perfectly Unique Pedal Practice.

34, Sheen Park, Richmond.

Dear Sir,—I have deferred writing to comment upon your Pedals and Action now attached to my pianoforte until I could satisfy myself of their utility and efficiency. I can now conscientiously say that they more than fulfil all my anticipations. Although I am no carpenter, aided by your lucid diagram I had little difficulty in attaching them myself, and it is impossible to over-estimate the comfort they give to me or to conceive the saving of time one experiences in one's own room.—Believe me, yours truly,

BURNHAM HORNER, F.R. Hist.S.

To Mr. Mr. Ainsworth.

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to bear testimony to the perfection of your Invention. I am more than satisfied with your Patent Action and Organ Pedals, and consider them worth double the money. Organists and organ students who desire to improve in the Art of Pedalling, which is so essential to a good organist, will do well to procure a set. I have seen no Action half so effective, and one can sit at the Piano and play, "Fixed in his everlasting seat," or any other organ music, or organ arrangement with the greatest pleasure. The touch of pedals could not be better, and the action is as you say, "Absolutely free from annoyances." They cannot be too highly recommended, as by their use, rapid progress is certain.—Believe me, sincerely yours,

I. B. Thornton,
Organist, Birstall, Leeds.

Cologne, July 16th, 1886.

My Dear Sir,—I have much pleasure in informing you that your Pedals have given the fullest satisfaction. I have them combined with my practice Piano. Many of my musical friends who have seen them, as well as my organ pupils, are quite delighted with them; and I must acknowledge that I have never met with any Pedals so noiseless and pleasant to play upon as yours. The Action I consider durable, and of very good workmanship. Every organist who desires to perfect his playing will welcome your invention. I can recommend your goods in every respect.—Yours truly,

Herr J. RODENKIRCHEN.

To John Ainsworth, Esq. Organist, The Cathedral, Cologne, Germany.

Facts and Comments.

On Monday the Lord Mayor presided over a meeting, convened for the purpose "of founding an institution for the further development and teaching of operatic art in this country." Amongst those present were the Principals of the Royal College, the Royal Academy, and the Guildhall School of Music, Mr. Parry, Mr. Goring Thomas, Mr. Stanford, Mr. Randegger, Mr. Carl Rosa, Mr. Alfred Lyttleton, Mr. Thomas Chappel, Mr. Hans Richter, and others; and in the course of the discussion it was elicited, as the unanimous opinion of the meeting, that an institution for the teaching of all that belonged to operatic art was urgently wanted in this country.

What is required, even more urgently, is a theatre at which the young idea, when it has left the hand of the teacher, can develope itself; in other words, a National Opera House. Whether this will ever be established on a solid basis without State aid or municipal aid, and whether even such aid being granted, native opinion will be brought to the point of regarding the native product as a thing equal to the foreign importation, are questions which the future may solve. We should be very glad to learn that the musical Lord Mayor has some big promise, either from the Corporation or the companies in his pocket, and, from the confident manner in which he spoke, we should almost conclude that this devoutly-to-be-wished-for consumation is not altogether outside the range of practical politics. So far, Mr. Alderman De Keyser has done little or nothing to commemorate his mayoralty in the indelible letters of history. Here, no doubt, would be a chance. In the meantime, his lordship will be able to get the best advice from a committee formed of some of the gentlemen already named, which is to report to the conference within a month. "Put money in thy purse," is the best piece of advice that could be tendered by anyone.

Wagner's early opera, "The Fairies," was produced at Munich in due course, and the critics speak of it exactly in the way in which critics generally speak of the immature production of the work of a man who subsequently became a great genius. Our own readers have already had some account of both the libretto and the music, to which we have nothing to add. Wagner, like Mendelssohn and other famous men, is paying the penalty of a great reputation by having the things that he would have liked to hide from every eye dragged before the public. We advisedly use the plural, for already the revival of another youthful opera by the great master, the MS. of which, also, is in the Bavarian archives, is on the cards. This is the "Novice of Palermo," founded upon Shakespeare's "Measure for Measure," and played once only at Magdeburg the night before the theatre was shut up from want of funds Will anyone found a limited liability company for the purpose of saving great and small men and their reputations from indiscreet friends and admirers?

The classical laurels of Oxford and Cambridge have given sleepless nights to the young students of Cheltenham College, and the result has been the "Elektra" of Sophocles, the performance of which, on Saturday, is spoken of as an excellent one by those who were present. The music, composed for the occasion by Dr. A. E. Dyer, the organist, who seems to have gone in largely for leit-motives, contained, we are told, "striking and original writing, elaborated upon the themes 'Vengeance,' 'Electra'—a plaintive strain—and 'Orestes'—a theme expressive of triumph, all introduced in the prelude, while the choral odes were modelled upon the Greek ode. The orchestra consisted of about 30 instruments, composed of the school band and friends from outside."

The death is announced, at Dresden, of Professor Emile Naumann, at the age of 61. Professor Naumann started in life as a pupil of Mendelssohn and composer, but failing to achieve much success in that line, took to criticism and æstheticism generally and wrote many books, one of which, a "History of Music," has been translated into English. It is not much above the level of competent book making.

"Pulsator Organorum" asks: "What was the first known piece of instrumental music ever written, i.e., committed to paper?" Here is a problem for the sages of the musical world to ponder over during the approaching holiday.

It is proposed to give a complimentary dinner to Sir John Stainer on the 17th inst., and an influential committee, with Lord Charles Bruce as chairman, and Mr. E. H. Turpin as hon. sec., has been formed for the purpose.

Eugene Wiener, the flautist, and manager of the New York Philharmonic Club, is visiting London, and will extend his travels to the principal music centres on the Continent, searching for novelties on his way

Mdme. Minnie Hauk expects to head an English opera company in America next season, when she will sing "Carmen" and Bizet's "Pearlfishers" for the first time in her native tongue.

The Edison Phonograph may in time work wonders in the musical world. We hear that a selection of six pieces from the programme of a concert at Orange, New York, has been sent to London. The selection varies from a simple ballad to a Gounod-Liszt waltz.

But better still remains. "There could not be devised," says the American Art Journal, "a better instrument to show the defects of the voice, nor a more useful aid to students or teachers of singing and elocution. Leaving aside nasal or guttural sounds, which, reproduced by the phonograph, are made hideous beyond the blessedness of ignorance or deafness of conceit, the slightest imperfection of emission and pronunciation is so emphasised, that the singer and speaker cannot help hearing their faults as plainly as they see their hare lip or upturned nose in a looking glass. Moreover, and perhaps more important than all, any relaxations in the stretched, sustained continuity of tone which constitutes legato singing, are negatively recorded by wavy troughs which, in the weaker reproduction by the phonograph, become actual gaps in the melody. In connection with this, we notice the significant fact that Mr. Edison is better satisfied with lively tunes than with slow ones. The perfect singer would be the one whose record of a largo on the phonograph would be as full and satisfactory to the ear as a piece of rapid execution."

"Le bon Dieu me dit; chante, Chante, pauvre petit."

Such is the burden of one of Beranger's most plaintive songs called "Ma Vocation," but it seems to have been adopted lately as a motto by an extremely large number of people who, it may be assumed, never read Beranger, whether "Des Familles" or otherwise. No doubt the poet himself was convinced of the authority of the voice which, throughout five verses, bade him to sing; and, indeed, Beranger had something to sing about. But the musical critic must be exonerated from the charge of callous cynicism if he questions whether it is indeed "le bon Dieu" who has commanded so many people in these latter days to sing at half-past three in the afternoon. Nor is the message delivered, in more or less doubtful intonation, of such weight as to convince the sceptical. Called on to sing they may perhaps be; but the command is given neither by the vox Dei, nor the vox populi. Perhaps it would be too much to say that it is de profundis; but, at any rate, the jaded critic may be forgiven for hoping that some of the young men and maidens of musical proclivities may cease to hear these voices of the night.

Stern and wild Caledonia had not, up till recent years, done a great deal for the cause of art. Indeed, when one reflects that it was a Scotchman who discovered, amongst other things equally startling, that the sentiments of Shelley's "Epipsychidion" were "wholly vile," one is rather inclined to think that, on the whole, Scotland had rather hindered than advanced the cause of art. But the Scotch should be cleared from one prejudice which has, in the popular mind, always attached to them. The Scotch did not invent the bagpipes. It is a negative sort of virtue, but much may be forgiven to those who have practised it.

"Don Quixote" is the subject of a new comic opera which will shortly be produced in New York. No doubt the gaunt knight and his donkey-riding squire will look funny enough on the stage; and, after all, it is not only Yankees who are unable to see the utter pathos underlying the story of Cervantes' great romance. A great and generous soul, betrayed into absurdity only by excess of chivalry—surely this is something too high and noble for the Philistines of comic opera.

Even yet the days of the infant phenomenon are not at an end. There has arisen in New York a juvenile violinist, aged 10, whose name is Tecumseh Hoffman. The editorial pocket would cheerfully be opened to contribute towards the support of a new Herod, who should massacre all children who do anything whatsoever.

When Miss Ellen Terry, in a comedietta performed the other day at St. George's Hall, consented to appear as Mary Jane, a part that had been previously rejected by all the members of the "Mummers," as one altogether too humble for their dramatic aspirations, she read a lesson to amateurs which might equally well have been applied to the regular profession, although while human and theatrical nature remains what it is, that lesson can hardly be expected to prove very fruitful in results. As far as the lyric stage is concerned, the boldest imagination wavers in its flight at any attempt to picture an artist of the calibre, for instance, of Mdme. Patti, volunteering to support some youthful debutante by playing, say Trasginta to her Carmen, or Annina to her Violetta.

The "Mary Jane" episode, however, may fairly be said to have been eclipsed at the first performance, this season, of "Il Flauto Magico," at Covent Garden, by Mdme. Scalchi, whose name was down in the bill for the first of the three genii, but who, when Mdme. Trebelli "schwore" from playing the first of the three damigelli, most heroically took that part also.

General regret will be felt at the announcement that the condition of Mdme. Sophie Menter's health is such as to require her immediate departure from these inclement shores to a warmer climate, and that the further pianoforte recital, that was to have been given in July, will therefore be unavoidably postponed. Most of the audience who attended the last recital are unaware that the plucky artist was doing battle, throughout the fulfilment of an unusually exacting programme, with the fell pains of acute neuralgia.

Of the two concerts which the Bach Choir intend giving next season, the first, to take place on March 5, will present an especially interesting feature, in the introduction of two cantatas by Bach, not hitherto heard in London. At the second concert, fixed for May 4, Beethoven's Mass in D will be performed.

Mr. Freeman Thomas will commence his next series of promenade concerts at Covent Garden, on Saturday, August the 4th, and on that occasion it is intended, for the comfort of the promenaders, to extend the space in front of the orchestra by several yards. If the orchestra platform could be pushed back far enough to oust from the field altogether the beer and lemonade bottles, and drive refreshment caterers into their legitimate place, the refreshment saloons, those at any rate who attend for the purpose of listening to music would have some reason to rejoice.

The blind Spanish guitarist, Manjon, who plays upon an instrument of eleven strings, will give a concert at St. James's Hall, on July 14. A picturesque, and sufficiently sympathetic instrument when used as an accompaniment to the voice, the guitar seldom lends itself effectively to feats of unusual executive difficulty, so that one has sometimes been tempted to say it is apt to sound worst when played best. Signor Regondi, of concertina fame, and a performer of decided genius in his particular line, used to play wonderfully also upon the guitar. But the effect he produced with his runs and florid passages often resembled nothing better than a modestly good performance upon a worn out piano of the tin-kettle order. Senor Manjon, however, comes from the land par excellence of guitar playing, and if report speaks true, makes remarkable music without sacrifice to the characteristics of his instrument.

Mr. Carl Meyer, the baritone, of the Cologne Opera House, who sang at the last Philharmonic concert, intends repeating his visit to England in May next year.

Mr. Raphael Gordon will give his first concert, at Steinway Hall, on Wednesday evening next, under the direction of Chev. Odoardo Barri.

BOOKS.

It must be confessed that the plan adopted by Mr. Henry Fisher in the production of a useful volume entitled "The Musical Profession" (J. Curwen and Sons), shows, in many respects, a considerable improvement upon the modern, but already worn out, system known as "interviewing"—a system which in many cases might be described as the permission accorded to a reporter by a celebrity to bore him on condition that he may be allowed facilities for boring a number of other persons in return. The long-winded egotistical confidences apt to result from compacts of this kind have been adroitly evaded by the present author. Anxious that his book should be really a fair reflex of the different opinions held upon various branches of the subject on hand by persons of standing and experience, he has taken the trouble to draw out a set of brief questions, and of submitting them for equally brief answer to sundry more or less eminent members of the musical profession. There seems every reason to believe, from internal evidence, that the replies thus obtained are of a sufficiently representative character; and the net result of his labours is a work which can hardly fail to interest both old stagers in the profession and those who are still debating with themselves as to the expediency of yet further swelling its ranks. To young persons belonging to the latter category encouragement is very properly meted out with a cautious hand, and in cases where the presence of certain obviously indispensable qualifications is not unmistakably indicated, Mr. Punch's famous "don't" figures prominently in the advice bestowed. The book, however, is for the most part addressed to those who have already taken the step, fatal or otherwise, and deals, sometimes at considerable length, with various questions connected with a teacher's career, its social, artistic, and business aspects; concert giving, the preparations of pupils for examinations, the organisation of choral and orchestral societies, and like matters. It might be taken for granted beforehand, that expressions of opinion obtained in the manner described would be likely to be neither very brilliant nor very original. There is no disparagement in calling the book a collection of truisms. On the whole it may safely be said that any one whose mind is thoroughly well equipped with all the trite truths applicable to a particular position, and able to marshal them at a moment's notice, as occasion requires, is likely to find more practical support in these than in the smartest of aphorisms. The author—for he is more than a compiler—has found evident pleasure in his work, which must have been of far from a light kind, and he has applied his method to the elucidation of so many and such various questions that few who are interested directly or indirectly in the subject of music teaching, will fail to find some helpful information in one part or another of this volume.

Two prettily got up volumes, redolent of the land of sun and song, which have lately been issued by Messrs. Ricordi, under the title of "Eco di Napoli," will prove a veritable treasure-house of melody to vocalists who love the graceful, flowing style associated with the native music of Italy. Among no less than a hundred short pieces which have been brought together, and in many instances transcribed by the editor, Signor Vincenzo di Meglio, will be found a good proportion of genuine national themes of various dates; having in their way—though this is a different way—as distinctive a character as the more rugged and vigorous folk song of the North, and showing that marked preference for the minor key usually noticeable in music of the kind. To these have been added some songs by Mercadante and other less familiar composers, the Neapolitan words being in all cases supplemented by an Italian version. The same publishers send "We Have Loved," by F. Paolo Tosti, in which this composer, though not at his best, has written gracefully for the drawing-room; and also from the same pen three Italian songs, decidedly superior in style to their English companion. There is much charm in a singularly plaintive use of the minor key in the opening bars of No. 1, entitled, "Segreto," as well as in the subsequent transition to the major. The other two, "Malia" and "Vieni," though perhaps not quite so characteristic, are, nevertheless, both pleasing and vocal; and the latter, a tuneful Barcarola, will scarcely fail to find favour.

"A Monk's Vision," by Sydney Shaw (Stanley Lucas and Co.), deals with a subject suggested by Gustave Doré's picture, "Day Dream," and will prove a sufficiently effective song, especially when the violin, harp, and harmonium accompaniment ad. lib. are brought into requisition. In "I am the shepherd true," by John A. Macmeikan, the religious sentiment of the words is well expressed by the music. "Going home, lad," is a decidedly tuneful song of more cheerful complexion, and possesses elements of popularity. (Both of the above, Stanley Lucas and Co.) There are signs of interesting intention, in many respects successfully carried out, in a song by H. Elliot Button, entitled "Ever Young" (Viaduct Publishing Company), the final modulations in which, however, strike us as being rather awkwardly managed.

INSTRUMENTAL.

William Czerny sends "Serenade," by Alfred Grunfeld, which will be found a pleasing pianoforte piece, as will also a well-written "Mazurka in F," by the same composer, and a pretty flowing melody entitled "A Sylvan Lay," by N. von Wilm. "Sweet Mignonette," song without words, by Oscar Wagner, is of only moderate originality.

From Novello, Ewer and Co., we receive "Duo Concertante," for pianoforte, violin or clarinet, or viola, by Charles Harford Lloyd, a musicianly work, in which the interest of both instruments is admirably sustained throughout. The single movement, of which this duet consists, abounds in pleasant melodic ideas, set forth in unmistakably artistic style, and violinists will do well in giving their attention to it. Among minor pieces for the same instrument, mention may be made of a graceful little solo, "Idyll in A," for violin, flute, or violoncello, by G. F. Kendall (William Czerny); a lively, characteristic "Ronde Bretone," for violin or pianoforte, by J. B. Tourneur (Viaduct Publishing Company); and a "Romance," No. 1, of "Six easy pieces," by Otto Peiniger (Stanley Lucas and Co.)

Amateurs of stringed instruments will find much serviceable material in a series of albums now in course of publication by Novello, Ewer, and Co., and of which Nos. 9 and 10 are just to hand. The former, "Six Morceaux de Salon," is a selection of themes written for violin, or violincello and pianoforte, by Joachim Raff, including the favourite "Cavatina," and the latter contains six effective "Characteristic pieces," for two violins and pianoforte, by Siegfried Jacoby. The very useful "Practical Violin School," by James M. Fleming (L. Upcot Gill), to which we have drawn attention on more than one occasion, is being re-issued in monthly parts.

Among recent dance music which may be singled out as pleasing and useful for their purpose, are "The Claudia Polka,' by Eille Norwood (Stanley Lucas and Co.); "Beneath the Roses," waltz, by Gilbert Byass (Charles Woolhouse), and "Threads of Silver" polka mazurka, by W. C. Levey (Viaduct Publishing Company).

VOCAL.

Two little collections, entitled "Chants Printaniers," by Juliette Folville (Ve Leopold Muraille, Liège), possess a musical interest which will not fail to recommend them to vocalists with a taste for songs of superior aim, and able to command the services of an efficient pianist. ~~The effect~~, at times melodic, and at others declamatory, of these songs, is enhanced by an accompaniment to which a share of work is allotted at least equal to that of the voice part, and in both will be found abundance of ideas, often of considerable charm, together with evidences of refined fancy and thorough mastery over harmonic resources. Their style is unmistakably French, and on occasions the influence of Gounod is apparent, but never to the extent of servile imitation. The ~~whole~~ of the first series, and part of the second, consist of settings of verses by Paul Collin, including the "Strophes" and "Air d'Andromaque," songs of the declamatory order, to which, however, many may prefer the more modern sentiment conveyed in "Sonnet du Printemps' "Le Sentier," "Serenade," and similar numbers, not forgetting "En Hiver," with its light accompaniment in clever imitation of the flying snowflakes. The same publishers also send a very pleasing "Berceuse" by this composer, which has been issued in separate sheet form.

Two other little songbooks, each containing a series of "Twelve Gipsy Songs," by Karel Bendl (Novello, Ewer, & Co.), with words illustrative of the joys, sorrows, and picturesque surroundings associated poetically with gipsy life, which have been translated from the German by F. Corder, possess merit of a different order. These short pieces, with their more strophic form, their clear cut melody, and characteristic rhythm, make somewhat less demand upon the musical perception of the hearer, but are, nevertheless, well worthy of a place in the vocalist's repertory.

"Oh Loving Heart," by Edward Lassen (Mdme. Czerny), though rather conventional in some parts, has both merit and qualities that are in favour of its popularity. "The Sailor's Grave," is a moderately effective song by Harold Clare Lewis (Harrison and Harrison, Birmingham). Three pretty two-part songs for female voices, have been contributed by Herbert F. Sharpe, entitled respectively "To the Crocus," "I'll rowe thee o'er the Learig," and "Morning Song," the second obtaining appropriate character by the use of an ancient scale (Charles Woolhouse). Amongst Messrs. Novello, Ewer, & Co.'s recent part music, are two pleasing trios for female voices, by George J. Bennett, "In Grotto Cool," and "In Dell and Dingle;" another effective trio, also for treble voices, by Berthold Tours, "To stay at home is best;" three serviceable anthems, "O ye that Love the Lord," by John Naylor; "Let the words of my mouth," by Arnold D. Culley; "This is the Day," by the Rev. E. V. Hall; and various numbers of the the tonic sol-fa series containing part songs by popular composers.

This happy circumstance enabled Berlioz to suspend his journalistic labours for seven months, and during that time he composed the beautiful symphony of "Roméo et Juliette." Before the work was introduced to the Parisian public, under the composer's direction, Janin sought to enlist the sympathies of his readers on behalf of the work, and, apart from showing the warm interest he took in it, what follows is a fair example of the charming manner with which he seemed to address every reader individually :—

"Do not forget what I am going to tell you. Do not pass this over in the same manner as you pass over everything, only too happy when you have discovered that this gentleman writes tolerably well, and that he possesses sufficient imagination and talent. Listen: The Concert of Hector Berlioz will take place on Sunday next, the 24th of this month, in eight days, in the large hall of the Menus Glaisirs, No. 2, Rue Bergere. This is important for you and for him. For you, the natural protectors of Berlioz, whom he instructs every day, and to whom he explains in these pages so many mysteries of his art, which you pretend to understand, and of which you would not know the first elements, intelligent readers, if some one more clever than yourselves were not appointed to instruct you. It will take place, with your permission, next Sunday, and you must come and encourage Berlioz. You will have to show a little goodwill and kindness, and it is also necessary that you should be a little attentive and serious, and that you should not come to show yourself, madame, nor to laugh, monsieur, but both of you to listen, to understand, to recall those tender passions, and to find on your charmed eyelids some of those gentle tears which alone can stimulate love and poetry. Come then, dressed in your most simple apparel, at two o'clock, and immediately I will tell you what awaits you. The most beautiful drama of Shakespeare, the most touching, the most terrible, and that which commences with the song of the morning lark, and ends with the complaint of the plaintive owl—'Romeo and Juliet'—duels, tumultuous confusions; ironies, and tender moonlight meetings on the balcony where the woodbine grows. Nights of darkness, nights of love, nights of festivities, nights of combats, and the terrible night of death. . . .

"Is it not a courageous undertaking? the terrible subject of the drama, which requires the genius of a Shakspeare! But what would you say if a man all alone, and only with the assistance of vocalists and instrumentalists, without comedians, without a theatre, without decorations, without the drama, and without any of the poet's accessories, should undertake (himself alone) to make you divine, to make you understand, and to make you recognise all the passions of the drama.

"And this is how one has the right to receive the alms of genius to genius! Paganini has performed a generous action. He has given an honest man of great talent, betrayed by his singer*, twenty ragged scraps of paper ornamented with a certain black stamp, and he will receive in return a masterpiece. For some pieces of badly stamped metal, he will receive a marvellous symphony by one who wants to love him, to honour him, and to return what he has given. Here, take it, maestro; all this belongs to you.

"In fact, Berlioz's new symphony 'Roméo et Juliette,' is dedicated to his benefactor, Nicolo Paganini. During nearly three months, two hundred and twenty musicians and choristers have been rehearsing this great drama. They were paid with Paganini's 20,000 francs.

"And yet some persons remarked that Berlioz with this money would pay his debts or purchase a house! If Berlioz had done it with this royal money, Berlioz would have been a thief."

Janin had to attend a revival of La Harpe's wearisome and antiquated tragedy, "Coriolan," at the Théatre-Français on the the night before the production of "Roméo et Juliette," and he, therefore had very little space at his disposal the following day to devote to Berlioz and his work. But after reading the article in question, one would not unnaturally come to the conclusion that the great critic must have been fast asleep during the greater part of the performance of "Coriolan," and to the astonishment of his readers he abruptly left the unpleasant task unfinished, and wrote :—

"And now I must hasten to Berlioz's concert. . . I have just returned from this concert, and the extraordinary and the charming melodies still resound in my ears and on my heart. But it is impossible for me to speak to-day of Berlioz's new and admirable symphony, 'Roméo et Juliette'; my soul and thoughts are too absorbed. Grant me at least a short time to recall to my mind this great drama, so full of passions and terrible scenes, so full of love, of eloquence, of genius, and sadness."

In the next weekly feuilleton, Janin, however, devoted all his energies to the work, and in a long article he gave a full description of its beauties. It would be, of course, impossible to reproduce all of it here, but the following extract will corroborate many of Berlioz's own remarks about the reception of the work in his memoirs and letters :—

"The success has been as great as it deserved to be. The terrible game which Berlioz played has been won, completely won. Those who abandoned him, those who plotted against him, those who treated his opera as a childish work, those who failed to recognise Berlioz's genius, the great tenor who was afraid to exert himself on the behalf of so great a genius, and who left him in the lurch, what will they say, what will they think, on seeing him so gloriously revenged after his former failure! They have only one word more to say, I do bite my thumb, as the Capulets said to the Montagues.

THE HANDEL FESTIVAL.

It is always around the second day of the Handel Festival—or "Selection Day," as it is called—that the interest of musicians chiefly centres. For however admirable the popular enthusiasm for "The Messiah" may seem, there is yet a mass of the Saxon master's works which is utterly unknown to the public, and with which musicians themselves are but slightly familiar, and it is in the discovery and presentation of these that the Festival does most service to the cause of art. It can hardly be claimed, however, that on the occasion immediately under notice any very valuable additions have been made to the Festival repertory. The chorus had but little to do, although two at least of its contributions were among the most interesting items of the programme. We refer more particularly to the "Calumny" chorus from "Alexander Balus," and "Ye tutelar Gods," from "Belshazzar," each of these being given with magnificent breadth and force. Nor is less favourable criticism deserved for the rendering of the "Coronation Anthem" and of "Wretched Lovers," the final part of which was, in especial, sung with admirable accuracy of attack. The solos far outnumbered the choruses, and included several pieces which, though known to amateurs, were new at these concerts. Almost the whole body of soloists appeared, and it was, therefore, hardly wonderful that so large an audience assembled to hear, or rather to look at, each singer. Mdme. Albani sang "Let the bright seraphim" in her most brilliant style, Mr. M'Grath playing the trumpet obbligato. "Lascia ch' io pianga" fell to the lot of Mdme. Trebelli, who made the utmost of the pathetic air. Mdme. Nordica, who made her first appearance at these festivals, sang "So shall the lute and harp," from "Judas Maccabæus," with much grace, the florid music of which was given with the greatest clearness, and the same lady also gave "Hush, ye pretty warbling choir," which, not less than her "wreathed smiles," won much approval. Credit should also be given to Miss Emily Squires, a young singer who joined Mdme. Nordica and Madame Trebelli in "See the conquering hero comes." Mr. Edward Lloyd sang "Love in her eyes" and "Call forth thy powers," in his best style. "Total Eclipse" and "Waft her, angels," were interpreted with much dignity and expression by Mr. Barton McGuckin. But again it is to Mr. Santley that the chief vocal honours must be awarded. In "Honour and arms" our great baritone achieved a second veritable triumph of art, overcoming the acoustic difficulties of the place with magnificent success. The orchestra gave an admirable performance of the overture to the "Occasional Oratorio," which was redemanded by the audience, nor should mention be omitted of Mr. W. T. Best's rendering of the organ concerto, No. 7, in B flat. The final day of the festival was occupied with the performance of "Israel in Egypt," when the largest audience on record assembled, amongst the constituents being Mr. Gladstone, who came presumably in the hope of forgetting the woes of Ireland in the recital of the more distant, if more appalling woes of the Egyptians. As might have been expected, the splendid volume of choral sound did its best work in the grand double choruses of "Israel," which afford the greatest scope for the style of singing which proves most effective in the Crystal Palace. These choruses recount an epic rather than a personal history, and give voice to a nation's sorrows, and a nation's triumphs, and this tale could scarcely be told in any more emphatic and graphic way than by the employment of so vast a chorus. A work so thoroughly known to all amateurs does not call for detailed comment. The chorus gave all possible effect to "The horse and his rider" and the "Hailstones," the latter chorus being encored, as indeed was scarcely unnatural. In "He sent a thick darkness," not less than in the choral numbers already mentioned, were the all but perfect intonation, the resonance, and the fire of the singers under Mr. Manns's guidance, made apparent. Amongst the soloists, Mr. Lloyd was certainly the most successful, giving "The enemy said" with magnificent effect. Mdme. Patey renewed her success with her solos, and Mdme. Valleria, in Miriam's song of triumph, was at her best. Miss Annie Marriott, Messrs. Bridson and Brereton completed the number of soloists, the lady especially singing with great simplicity and pathos. At the close of the festival Mr. Manns was the recipient of an ovation which, complete as it was, was but an adequate recognition of the service which the conductor has rendered throughout an arduous week. That the festival has been from the financial, not less than from the artistic point of view, entirely successful, will be seen from the subjoined statistics, which show the attendances at the festivals of 1885 and 1888 respectively.

ROYAL NORMAL COLLEGE FOR THE BLIND.

The Fawcett Memorial playgrounds at the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind at Upper Norwood were recently opened by Mr. Mundella, M.P., in the presence of a large number of the friends of the institution. The memorial address was to have been delivered by Mr. Leslie Stephen, who, however, was prevented by illness from being present. The first part of the proceedings consisted of an inspection of the physical exercises and amusements which play so important a part in the system of education pursued at the College. These included gymnastics, roller skating, swimming, cycling, rowing, rope-skipping, and swinging, and the training which the pupils had received, together with their facility in performing all these exercises, excited much comment and admiration.

A meeting, at which Mr. Mundella presided, was subsequently held.

The Chairman in the course of his speech said that if the spirits of the departed were conscious of what took place in this world, he could not help thinking Fawcett was rejoicing with them that day. No man who was ever afflicted with blindness had greater courage, moral as well as physical, a keener sense of enjoyment, or took his exercises with a greater zest than Fawcett. There was nothing nearer to his heart than that the blind should have as great opportunities of physical enjoyment as those which he enjoyed, and as those which were offered in the name of Fawcett that day to the students of the Royal Normal College for ever. He rejoiced that Dr. Campbell had come across the Atlantic and given them the benefit of his wonderful skill and energy in the education of the blind in England. That institution, which began with two students only 16 years ago, and at a time when, to use Mr. Fawcett's own words, only 1 per cent. of the blind in England were able to earn their own living and in the enjoyment of independence as compared with 50 per cent. in America, that institution which had now between 160 and 170 students, owed its marvellous results to the admirable courage and power of its principal, Dr. Campbell. It had been his (the chairman's) duty to investigate all the best blind schools of Europe, and, excellent as the German schools especially were, he believed one need not go from home to see the best example of a blind institution that could be found in Europe; it was there, on that spot. For physical education there was no blind school that he had ever seen which possessed the same advantages as that school. The noblest charity was that which helped people to help themselves, and that institution had made many self-sustaining, self-reliant, and independent; it was turning out excellent teachers and trainers of the blind, and what had been accomplished by their means already was most encouraging and almost marvellous. He had examined blind women who were now teachers in London Board schools, teaching the blind, and the testimony had been given to him by members of the London School Board, and all the evidence tended to show that no one could teach some things to the blind, as well as the blind themselves. The worst thing that could be done for a blind child was to regard it as a helpless invalid; that was the tendency of many mothers of blind children, and it was the trained blind person who could most successfully prove the fallacy of that opinion. That institution had given a tone to every blind institution in the country. Other institutions began now to learn that to mew up the children in blind asylums was, as Mr. Fawcett had said, little better than putting them in prisons. The children must be taught to do all that people with sight could do, and to do it with courage and self-reliance. He hoped the Commission on the Blind would take care that no blind child should escape from tuition, or be deprived of the advantages which an institution like the Normal College presented. (Loud cheers.)

Sir Lyon Playfair said that among the uneducated blind there was a great deal of apathy, and that apathy often amounted to despair. But among the intelligent blind there was none of that apathy or despair. It was by improvement of the health of the body that they were able by the help of their teachers to get over the disability and to become good and useful citizens. It was the attention given to the health of the body which enabled that institution to be such a remarkable one. It was a grand beginning, enabling every other blind institution to do something in the same way. (Cheers.)

Mr. Mundella then declared the Fawcett Memorial to be open.

Dr. Campbell (the principal) and other speakers also addressed the meeting.

The Organ World.

ON MUSICAL OBSERVATION.

By Charles Joseph Frost, Mus. Doc., Cantab, F.C.O.

It is surprising sometimes to find the lack of this in people who have studied music, or practised it in some way or other for years. They will go on in their groove, in such a straightforward and mechanical way, that they never get out of it. If the piano is the instrument upon which they bestow their time, they do it frequently with great zeal, in one direction only, forgetful of the advantage it would be to their playing if they were to expand their minds in other directions, and cultivate their musical perceptions. They should never attend concerts or musical performances without bearing this in mind, or else they get into a way of listening which gives them no educational benefit; whereas every piece performed ought to be of considerable service in sharpening their perceptions, and teaching them something. The attention should be so concentrated upon it, that outward things do not distract it. The first thing that should be settled in a listener's mind at the commencement of a performance, is the pitch and key. Where analytical programmes are available, great helps are afforded towards this; but a listener who desires to school himself to musical observation, should first of all try himself, and decide what he thinks the key is, and then verify or correct his assessment of it by means of such programme. He must expect to find a little difficulty at first in settling such a point, for it is only one here and there who does such things intuitively, but the many may by degrees be guided to a knowledge of this; though, perhaps, in early stages it may result in being only near the mark, and not quite exact. As in most other accomplishments, larger practice will be necessary for this. The melodies of the different strains might then be followed in such a way that their real notes are pictured to the mind as they appeal to the ear. This cannot of course be accomplished at once, and therefore such students as have had some kind of preliminary practice at such things will take to it the quickest; but even those that have had none, could follow a strain in part, and so determine one or two of its notes. The difficulty they find is, that, while they are thinking this out, the music goes on, and that they cannot follow the new, while reasoning out the old. Better that some should thus escape notice than that the whole should be heard, and none of it thought out. Every accomplishment must be commenced in a small way, and have the larger points brought on by degrees, and it is the same with the subject at present under consideration. For, if a student attempted to think out the whole thing at once, having had no previous practice, or experience, in this direction, the result must inevitably be failure. Having attained some practice in picturing out the melodies he hears, a student might try to follow the bass, which is perhaps next to the treble, the most ready for early efforts to trace. The outer parts are naturally easier to follow than the inner ones. Their position causes this, for the outside parts make the most impression, especially upon untutored ears. When a certain facility has been obtained in this way, in tracing the more prominent melodies, and thinking them out as they would look on paper, the harmonies might then begin to receive a little attention. Certain chords in ordinary use will be recognised almost immediately, by the frequency of their recurrence, and their familiar effect.

Others will give the listener more trouble to determine, but on that account should be persevered with, so as to be mastered and made available thoughts. A student should further try to follow the form of a composition which is being listened to, by determining what is first subject, what is second; then tracing their development and reappearance in the reprise. This may even be done by those unable to picture the notation of the music; and so, in a way, stands apart from that accomplishment, but they can be linked together, and a man is not a thorough musician who has not schooled himself to follow and picture both the music and the form at the same time.

Further experience towards this end may be obtained by practising writing from memory, and this should form part of the curriculum of all harmony classes. To some even brilliant players, and perhaps cultured musicians up to a certain point, such a task would puzzle them, not so much from inability to do it, as from want of practice at it. Such, if asked to write out such a simple, well-known tune as "God Save the Queen," "Home, Sweet Home," or "The Last Rose of Summer," would produce something that would caricature it almost beyond recognition, by reversing accents, wrongly barring it, putting incorrect time values, misjudging intervals as large, or larger than a third, and the like. And yet such people know those tunes well enough, as their singing or whistling of them might be made to prove, but, though expert players, they cannot possibly think out anything they know.

Without this accomplishment can such as these ever become efficient teachers? I trow not. For how would it be possible for such to show a pupil right when they cannot themselves say what is wrong? If a pupil does wrong in this way a teacher ought to be able to say what notes were played instead of the correct ones, or he is not worthy of his work. Such a half-competent person would never be able to read and understand music that he could not play, for he is unable to tell what it will sound like without hearing it. To such the full scores of the great masters must ever remain sealed books, except on such occasions as they may be able to attend a performance of them. They are thus finger musicians, not head musicians, and perhaps this class embraces the larger proportion of those who in the present day learn to play. In our every-day bread and butter world, people, when they want to learn to play the piano, take piano lessons; or the violin, then violin lessons, which is, of course, the proper thing to do, as they could never do either without it; but it should not be the end—all of their efforts, for while they are doing this they should at the same time try to raise their musicianship in various ways, that already talked of being one that should come in for a fair share of attention. We have not yet arrived at that stage when special lessons should be given in this subject, but teachers in harmony classes might do a great deal by giving this subject sound attention in their class time. They might play or sing matter to be written by dictation, which, though necessarily simple at first, might soon be elaborated. They should cultivate their pupil's perception of the movement of notes that are listened to, their time, and lastly, their accentuation.

Such exercises, to be thorough, and not to be overtaxing, might embrace these subjects separately before they are attempted all in one exercise. This method is found convenient in singing classes also. First, for the movement of notes, it would be well that the practice be all in conjunct work in the first stages, so that the pupil's ear may be trained by degrees to perceive the ups and downs or stationary character of the notes dictated, without being puzzled to assess intervals larger than a second. Indeed it would be most unwise to pass on to this till the first is thoroughly mastered. The certain judgment of intervals longer than a second will be much more difficult, and so require considerable practice; and it will be thus seen that if the pupil is bothered with the assessment of time also, that it is almost a hopeless task in the early stages, therefore it would be well that all such dictation exercise up to this point should be in notes of the same length throughout.

It is only when that is mastered that time exercises should be considered, and these, for the same purpose of presenting but one difficulty at a time, it would be advisable to have all upon one note, or upon one or two only. The question of accentuation might then be approached, and this is one upon which a good deal of time may have to be spent, for to those not accustomed to take notice of such things, it takes considerable time to use themselves to an observance of them. Such dictation work as has been here alluded to, would be found very beneficial to musical students generally; more particularly to those who want to cultivate and improve their faculty of musical perception. Those who had worked at such things would find on attending performances that their mind began to be exercised directly the music began, and that almost intuitively they would begin to picture the notation of the music as the performance proceeded. If those who possess this gift of hearing with their mind's eye, and seeing with their ears (as the late John Hullah so aptly put it), were asked how they came possessed of this faculty, they would acknowledge that they had no special training for it, but that it was of slow growth and came chiefly from attending concerts, and of attentive listening and thinking of music, whenever and wherever they could hear it.

The faculty once acquired, though really indispensible to a musician, is not of necessity also a thing of bliss upon all occasions. In the case of imperfect performances, there is more sense of annoyance to the one so trained, than to one whose musical perception was less acute, for his mind asserts with redoubled force all the imperfections which the ear alone troubles the other by. Still the advantages to a musician so far outweigh the disadvantages, that he will be to blame who does not exercise himself to musical observation on every available opportunity.

ORGAN RECITAL PLAYING.

XVI.

To what extent Handel kept the harpsichord in view as the alternative solo instrument is a matter of no consequence, as the harpsichord has disappeared; most probably he only contemplated performance on that medium for home solo use, and intended the concertos to be publicly played on the organ—that is, the sets originally named for that instrument. The perspicuity and dignity of these works as originally scored for orchestra and organ are truly remarkable, and must be heard to be realised, as the eye of even the practised musician cannot realise the power and richness of the music by a mere inspection of the scores. It is as though a master of acoustical science had laid out the harmonies with a profound knowledge of a multum in parvo method of composition. This power is rare, and seems only the gift of great and experienced writers. Beethoven, for instance, displays the faculty with frequent success. Those who are willing to trust the master's effects and can play with courage, decision, and clearness, will be rewarded in presenting Handel's concertos with orchestral acccompaniments. However, in most instances they can only be given as solo organ pieces. In their way they demand careful study. It will not suffice to regard the orchestra as doing mere tutti or ritornel work, and so to assign the orchestral sentences to the great or any given manual. It would be extremely interesting to know how the composer himself registered for the organ or solo passages. Many of them are well written for the upper octaves, and so seem to be intended for bright eight, or eight and four feet stops. One might even venture to suppose the piano passages as specially fitted for the fiddle G swells of the period; this remark, at any rate, would seem to have some force as regards the more expressive and certain recitative and cadenza periods. There appears, however, no information with regard to the construction and capacity of the certainly small, and most probably very limited organs, Handel played upon with the orchestra, and the swell was still something of a luxury in the first half of the last century; even the echo organ, the predecessor of the swell, was not always to be found on small instruments, and an organ of two manuals would seem to have been—unlike such instruments of our day, which have almost invariably great and swell—built most frequently with great and choir manuals. Before leaving this portion of the subject, it will be well to say a few more words regarding typical passages and their adaptability for illustration, in accordance with the genius and powers of the modern organ.

E. H. TURPIN.

II.

Speaking of Giorgione, the youthful inaugurator of the great Venetian School of colour, of whose work so little now is left to us, Mr. Symonds says, "In his drawings he models the form without outline by massive distribution of light and dark. They suggest colour, and are indeed the design of a great colourist who saw things under the conditions of their tint and tone." And of Titian he says, "Titian gave to colour in the landscape and the human form a sublime yet sensuous poetry no other painter in the world has reached." And of Tintoretto and Veronese he says, "The imagination of Tintoretto is too passionate and daring; it scathes and blinds like lightning—the sense of splendour in Veronese is overpowering and pompous. His domain is noonday sunlight ablaze on sumptuous dresses and Palladian architecture." But why should I strain to prove this premise? Do we not know that Titian and Veronese were the apostles of colour? Do we not know that the Venetian school of the 16th century was the school of colour?

The Venetians rejoiced in their civic pageants and in their civic services in the church of St. Mark, and the influence which their architecture had exerted upon their painters, their painting exerted upon their musicians.

Willaerts, one of the many celebrated musicians who, during the 15th century, emigrated from the Netherlands, was their organist and director of music during the early part of the sixteenth century. And he was the first to substitute in vocal writings for the strict movement of the separate parts, which may be fitly compared to drawing, certain broad harmonies for harmony's sake, giving a colouring which must have delighted the ears of the Venetians, whose eyes were already satiated with the gorgeous colours of Tintoretto, Paul Veronese, and Titian.

Naumann, in his history of music, a translation of which has been recently published in England, with valuable additions by Sir Frederick Gore Ouseley, has suggested that Willaerts obtained this idea from the fact that there were two organs opposite to each other in the Church of St. Mark—that the choir, therefore, got divided into two halves, and that this gave scope for the treatment of the chorus in the form of a double chorus, which, he says, Willaerts was the first to adopt, and which naturally tended to the use of broad harmonies.

This may very possibly be the case. It is not unnatural that an accidental arrangement of the organs in the church may have been seized by a genius as a means for obtaining a particular effect. But I think that Naumann has missed the real point of the renaissance and the influence on music of the other arts which had already undergone revival, for he says elsewhere (Vol. II, p. 767), "The musical renaissance dates then from the era of the six great composers," Bach, Gluck, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven. Thus he places the renaissance in Germany instead of in Italy, which was ever the home of classical thought, and in time he places it in the eighteenth century, which is too long after the real renaissance to be reasonably connected with it. While admitting the possibility of the accidental discovery of an effect as stated by Naumann, I cannot help also seeing in the harmonic effect itself of the double chorus something more than an accident, something for which the musician may have been searching long—the colours of the pigments in the Venetian pictures, the colours of the marbles in the Venetian architecture, and even the reflected colours of the sky in the Venetian lagoon.

That this first indication of a new departure should have been shown in Venice, is interesting in more ways than one. I have shown the interest which attaches to it as the introduction into music of colour in the midst of the great Venetian school of colour in painting. Then it is interesting historically, in connection with music itself. Giovanni Gabrieli is an important name in the history of the Venetian school of music. As he was only five years old when Willaerts died, he cannot have been directly influenced by the great old Netherlands master; though, as a child, he may have been taken by his uncle to hear Willaerts. The uncle was a pupil of Willaerts, and ultimately succeeded him at St. Mark's, and was the master of Giovanni Gabrieli. Giovanni Gabrieli developed the harmonic colouring invented by Willaerts, and his writings include compositions for three choirs, showing that if the two organs of St. Mark's suggested to Willaerts the possibility of using two choruses for harmonic colouring, it happily did not suggest to Gabrieli the impossibility of using more than two choruses. But it seems that Gabrieli developed the principal of colouring in other ways. He used instrumental accompaniments more largely than his predecessors, and his modulations are so advanced that in Sir George Grove's dictionary it is stated that "in this respect he may be called the father of the chromatic style." One of Gabrieli's pupils was Heinrich Schütz, and this is what he says of his master:—

"I served my first year of apprenticeship under the great Gabrieli. Ye immortal gods, what a man was that! If the ancients, so rich in expression, had been acquainted with his powers, they would have placed him above the Amphions, and if the Muses had been inclined to enter the marriage state, Melpomene would have desired no other husband than he, so great was he in his art." Observe that language could not be more thoroughly imbued with classic thought than is that of Schütz.

Schütz, while in Venice, lived with his master, Gabrieli, and his master bequeathed to his favourite pupil his signet ring. How interesting is this emblem left by the donor to one whom he had selected as worthy to succeed him. How little did Gabrieli know of the magnitude of the bequest he was making.

Schütz returned to Germany, bearing with him the magic signet ring, and from that moment the ascendancy in music passed from Italy to Germany. There were many great Italian composers yet to be born, but not one who could be compared with the mighty geniuses soon to spring from the Teutonic soil.

Schütz thus forms the chief connecting link between the Italian school and the German school. He also carried harmonic colouring further than his predecessors. There has recently been discovered a setting by him of the 150th Psalm for four choirs, with very original orchestral effects. Moreover, he is closely connected with the renaissance, being the first German who composed an opera. The subject was of course classical, "Daphne." Schütz carried the dramatic style into sacred music in a manner which distinctly anticipates the work of Bach. Besides the peculiar dramatic effect in Bach's music, on which to enlarge now would involve too long a digression, his Passion music and some of his church cantatas were, as we all know, written for two choirs, each accompanied by its own orchestra; and these were stationed on opposite sides of the church, as at St. Marks, in Venice. Thus the great double choruses of Bach, and, I might add, Handel's "Israel in Egypt," are the direct development of the colour compositions of Willaerts and the Venetian school.

Finally, it is interesting that this first feeling of renaissance should have been shown in Venice, because Venice was for a long time the home of the opera.

The real change effected by the renaissance in music was, of course, the discovery, if I may use the word, of the musical drama or opera. In referring to this in detail, a word of apology is necessary if I appear to be labouring on a part of my subject with which many of my audience are probably better acquainted than myself. But I must go into it to show that the change in music was of a piece with the change which had taken place in every other art. The mode of thought passed away from the abstract ideas of God and of another world to the concrete beauty of Nature and of the things of this world. Worship became less in influence, and realism became greater. In painting, for example, the pictures of the renaissance depart from the idea of a virgin and an infant Saviour, and become those of a mother and a child. Men painted real life from real models; the absolute copy of living man replaced the conventional treatment of the mediæval saint. Men wrote sonnets instead of hymns, and in everything the worldly influence of realism began to displace the fancies of the imagination.

THE COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS EXAMINATION.

A paragraph of the calendar of the college reminds those interested that the half-yearly examinations are again at hand. Candidates should send in their names on or before July 10th. The F.C.O. Examination will be held as follows:—Paper work on July 17th in two sections, from 10 to 1.30 and from 2.30 to 6; organ playing tests will be taken in rotation on July 18th and 19th; each candidate will attend on the particular day and hour appointed. The A.C.O. paper will be similarly worked on July 24th, in sections, from 10 to 1.30, and from 2.30 to 6; and the organ playing will be performed by rotation on July 25th and 26th. The Diploma Distributions will take place after each examination, that is on July 20th and 27th, at 11. The examiners, six for each examination, are, as before, men of the greatest reputation and highest position in the organ playing and theoretical departments of the art.

THE STAINER DINNER.

The committee organised to make arrangements for the dinner intended as an expression of public appreciation of the great services rendered to the art by Sir John Stainer and congratulation upon the honour bestowed upon him by the Queen, has gained the addition of several distinguished names during the past week. A complete list will be published presently. By a much to be regretted mistake, the Royal College of Music was not mentioned as one of the great institutions represented on the Stainer Dinner Committee. Those who read the list of influential names given, would, however, observe that the Royal College was very strongly represented; some seventeen to twenty gentlemen named being connected with that important institution. It is pleasant to offer this explanation, and to point out the kindly interest taken in the matter by these gentlemen; especially remembering Sir John Stainer's valuable and distinguished labours at one time as Principal of the National Training School, the forerunner of the Royal College of Music. The gratifying announcement is made that Lord Herschell will preside at the dinner to be given in the Whitehall Rooms, at the Métropole Hotel, at 7.30, on July 17th. The tickets, 25s. each, may be procured of the Hon. Sec., Mr. E. H. Turpin, at the College of Organists, or of Mr. A. H. Littleton, Hon. Treasurer, 1, Berners Street.

RECITAL NEWS.

Westminster Abbey.—The Jubilee of the Coronation of H.M. the Queen was fitly celebrated on 28th June, when there was a festival service in the nave, with collection amounting to £250, in aid of Westminster Hospital. Order of service included, March from the "Occasional Oratorio," Handel; The National Anthem, with additional or alternative verse, by C. N. Skeffington; Psalm 20 (5th tone, 2nd ending, arranged by Dr. Bridge; Anthem, "Hosanna to the Son of David," Orlando Gibbons (sometime Organist of Westminster Abbey, died 1625); "Te Deum" (Dedicated to H.R.H. the late Prince Consort), Berlioz; which, with its imposing instrumental and choral effects, produced a great impression; "Coronation Anthem," Handel; and "Amen," Dr. Stainer. The Bach Choir, Members of the Cambridge University Musical Society, and the choir and orchestra of the Royal College of Music took part, in the service, in addition to the choir of the Abbey, and the children of the Chapel Royal, St. James's Palace. The music was under the direction of Dr. Bridge, Organist of Westminster Abbey. Dr. Stanford, conductor of the Bach Choir, conducted the "Te Deum," the fine obbligato organ part being admirably played by Dr. Bridge. It is unnecessary to say the music was admirably rendered.

Peterborough.—A contemporary observes: "Lincoln and Peterborough have joined hands in the inauguration of a triennial musical festival similar to that of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford. It is hoped that the neighbouring dioceses of Ely and Southwell will also join the amalgamation. In that event each city would have a festival in its turn. According to existing arrangements Peterborough introduces the new régime, Lincoln will follow with a festival next year or the year after, and then each will hold musical gatherings after the lapse of the respective triennial periods. Connected with the Peterborough Choir alone triennial festivals have already been held, and the years 1882 and 1885 witnessed such successful gatherings as to warrant the present extension. On the first of those occasions the pieces rendered were Haydn's "Creation," and selections from the "Messiah" and the "Elijah," and the principal soloist was Madame Marie Roze. In 1885 Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Spohr's "Last Judgment," and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" were the selections. At the recent festival Peterborough Cathedral was crowded by clergy and laity. In the lack of chancel, which is now in course of restoration, the choir were accommodated in side galleries at the eastern end of the nave. With the band, the performers constituted a body more than 300 strong. The chorus consisted of the Cathedral Choirs of Peterborough and Lincoln, and contingents from the choral societies of Peterborough, Northampton, Leicester, and Market Harborough. The leader of the band was Mr. Val Nicholson; the organist, Mr. C. Hancock, Mus. Bac., F.C.O. (St. Martin's, Leicester). The principal vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Lena Little, Mrs. J. Stott, Mdlle. Seegers, Mr. C. Banks (Hereford), Mr. Dunkerton (Lincoln Cathedral), and Mr. Grice (St. Paul's Cathedral). The conductor was Dr. Hadyn Keeton, F.C.O., organist of Peterborough Cathedral. The programme was in the afternoon Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," and in the evening that master's "Lobgesang" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater." With the text of the "Stabat Mater" a liberty was taken which the impulsive Rossini might not have relished. The Dean of Peterborough had altered the text, invoking Christ instead of allowing the appeal to be made to the Holy Mother, according to the original.

At the re-opening of Kirkheaton Church (Yorkshire), Mr. W. C. Ainley, Mus. Bac., gave a recital on the new organ. His programme, well performed throughout, included a Meditation by Chipp, Bach's well-known Fugue in E flat, and a "Recessional March" of his own, composed for the occasion.

At the re-opening of the organ of St. John's Church, Alloa, on Sunday last, Mr. F. W. Smallwood, A.C.O., gave a recital which was listened to by a large congregation, the selection consisting of works by Handel, Mendelssohn, Lefébure Wély, Braga, and Guilmant. The organ has undergone a thorough repair, which has been done to the satisfaction of all by Messrs. Forster and Andrews, of Hull.

High Wycombe.—A recital was given on the organ in the Parish Church by Mr. J. G. Wrigley, F.C.O., Mus. Bac. Oxon., on the 25th instant. The following formed the programme:—Sonata in B flat, No. 4 (Mendelssohn); Air, with variations (Haydn); Berceuse (Gounod); "The Lost Chord" (Sullivan); "But the waters overwhelmed their enemies," "Israel in Egypt" (Handel); Marche Funébre et Chant Seraphique (Guilmant); Dead March, "Saul" (Handel.)

Godalming Parish Church.—Programme of recital given on June 29th, by F. de G. English, Esq., A.C.O., assisted by H. T. Tiltman, Esq., F.C.O., and O. Haenni, Esq. (Violin). Allegro Moderato in A, Smart; Andante and Allegretto (Sonata IV.), Mendelssohn; Cavatina (Violin, Mr. Haenni), Raff; Nocturne in F minor, Chopin, Mr. Tiltman; Andante (Violin Concerto), Mendelssohn; Sonata in D minor (First Movement), Guilmant, Mr. Tiltman; Two Pieces for Violin, Corelli (Violin, Mr. Haenni); Prelude in A, Smart; Sonata VI. in D minor, Mendelssohn.

Bury St. Edmund's.—At St. Mary's Church a performance of Dr. Stainer's sacred cantata, "S. Mary Magdalen,' was given, with orchestral accompaniment, on June 14th. The principal vocalists were:—Madame Lita Jarrett, Miss A. E. Snape, Rev. A. W. Ivatt, and Mr. Frederick Pattle. Leader of band, Dr. Henry; organist, Mr. George C. Richardson, organist of St. Augustine's, Highbury; and conductor, Mr. T. B. Richardson, organist and choirmaster of S. Mary's. After the cantata, Mr. G. C. Richardson played Prelude and Fugue in A minor (Bach); Berceuse (Dellbrück); 2nd Sonata, last movement (Mendelssohn); Offertoire in A (L. Wély); and "Marche Pontificale" (Lemmens).

Dulwich College.—On Founder's Day, June 23rd, Mr. W. H. Stocks gave a recital on the organ in the Great Hall. Programme:—March, "Die Meistersinger" (Wagner); Adagio Cantabile in D (Dr. E. J. Hopkins); Minuet in C (Smart); Prelude and Fugue in G (Mendelssohn); Bridal music, "Lohengrin" (Wagner); March in G (Smart).

Notes.

At one of the churches at Modena a new Mass by Signor Trebbi has been performed. The Mass was generally admired, and is another token of the revival of ecclesiastical music in Italy, where church and organ music has been rapidly advancing of late years.

Herr Hermann Sander, the organist of the Johanniskirche, at Leipzig, died on May 22nd, at the early age of 35 years.

The Nonconformist Choir Union held a festival service in the City Temple on Tuesday last. The conductors were Messrs. E. Minshall and F. G. Edwards.

Gounod was lately at Rheims to direct the rehearsals of his fourth solemn Mass in the Cathedral of that city. The Mass, composed for the occasion of the Beatification of Father De la Salle, the founder of the Ecoles Chrétiennes, was to be performed on June 24th. Besides the Mass M. Gounod has composed a "Te Deum" for organ, soli, chorus, and harps.

It is most gratifying to hear that Sir John Stainer's health is said to have improved since his retirement from some of his more pressing labours, and it is hoped that his sight may be improved by rest.

Dr. Fisher's new work, "The Musical Profession," deals with such topics of interest to the organist as: Musical performances in church, the legal position of the Organist, the Choirmaster, the Organist and Vicar, Examinations, Diplomas, and the College of Organists and its work.

Mr. J. F. Barnett writes to the Musical Standard:—"It may not be out of place for me to give my reasons for not having employed the organ in the church scene of my Pastoral Suite at the recent performance of the work at the Philharmonic Concerts. The organ, although used in conjunction with orchestra and chorus in oratorio and cantata, is, perhaps, too distinctive in character to be used as an orchestral instrument. The most available effect would undoubtedly be to couple the pedal notes of the organ with the double basses; for although the soft diapason of the organ may be successfully imitated by a combination of orchestral instruments, as Beethoven has accomplished in one of the orchestral episodes in the finale of the Choral Symphony, there is no orchestral instrument which resembles the sublime pedal note of the organ. As, however, the organs in most of our concert-rooms do not possess pedal stops sufficiently refined in character, I resolved to rely entirely on an orchestral effect, not, indeed, to imitate the king of instruments, but rather to suggest to the imagination distant organ music."

On June the 22nd, Dr. Stainer entertained the vicars and assistant vicars choral of St. Paul's Cathedral at dinner at the Albion Tavern, on the occasion of his farewell. Dr. Stainer was asked to accept the gift of a picture by C. J. De Lacy, in memory of old times.

The troops in garrison at Exeter attended service at the Cathedral recently, accompanied by the band of the 1st Battalion Devonshire Regiment from Aldershot, which had been at Exeter during the past week. The band was used throughout the service instead of the organ. It is to be regretted that experiments are not oftener made in the way of using organ with military bands upon such occasions. Most likely in this, as in other cases, the pitch question made such union impossible.

In a suburban paper "One who Hates Hypocrisy" attributes to the "meddlesome matties" of the Church Council of St. Mary's, Hornsey, an impoverished choir and some organ troubles. Probably there are two sides to this story.

The new Birmingham Town Hall organist will be Mr. C. W. Perkins, of St. Michael's, Paddington.

Mr. Walter B. Gilbert, F.C.O., organist of Trinity Church, New York, recently received his well-merited Mus. Doc. degree at Oxford. Mr. Gilbert is a native of Exeter, and was formerly on the cathedral staff there. Sir F. Gore Ouseley presented him for his degree. His "exercise" was rendered in grand style in the Sheldonian Theatre. It is entitled "Thanksgiving and Praise," and was composed nearly twenty years ago.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS' CALENDAR.

On Tuesday next, July 10th, Meeting of Examiners, at 8; on the same day the library will be opened from 7 to 8. July 14th, Council Meeting at 8. July 17th, 18th, 19th, F.C.O. Examination; July 20th, Diploma Distribution; July 24th, 25th, 26th, A.C.O. Examination; July 27th, Diploma Distribution. Candidates should send in their names, with fees, on or before July 10th. Every information may be obtained on application. Other arrangements and particulars will be duly announced.

"BY DESIRE."

In these two little words, by means of which extra prominence is occasionally given to certain items of a programme, many concert-goers of a speculative turn will no doubt have found material for rather interesting entr'acte reflection. Looking around the audience, some of whom will perhaps seem to be conning the pregnant announcement for the first time, the first question likely to exercise their mind is "by whose desire?"—a question generally enshrouded in as much obscurity as is the identity of those mysterious individuals who are in the habit of exasperating the impecunious by their attempts to doctor bruised consciences, in many cases no doubt scarcely worth so extravagant an outlay, with plaisters of bank-notes forwarded to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Thoughtful inquirers also will not fail to notice slight variations in the wording of the formula that may be taken to express certain degrees and subtle shades of meaning, comprehensible only by the experienced. Even as Mr. Tom Taylor used to claim, in connection with his plays, altogether different interpretations for the phrases "original," "new and original," and "entirely new original"—by the use of the latter alone, if we remember aright, would he allow himself to have been committed to an assertion of absolute originality—so have we here "by desire," "by special desire," and "by unanimous desire." From the two first expressions but a vague notion can be formed of the numerical force of enthusiasts thus anxious to lend a hand in the arrangement of the programme. The request may have been preferred by several persons, or by only one. Allowing our eyes to wander down the rows of stalls, we are fancy free to single out any elderly lady or gentleman nodding to the music with closed eyes, any youth of poetic mien, or maiden whose manner seems to betoken possibilities of gush, as the sender of that missive, scented or otherwise, which has thus succeeded in melting the hearts of those placed in authority. But it will often be a still easier task for the attentive observer to distinguish those who are not likely to be concerned in the matter. If, for instance, the composition selected "by desire" should happen to belong to the school of Wagner or Liszt, there are sure to be among the listeners a few with set faces and an air of mingled boredom and irritation which in themselves would be sufficient to exonerate them from any charge of being accessories either before or after the fact. Longing of a more ardent kind would seem to be indicated in the extended formula "by special desire." Here, again, one is apt to ask "of how many?" Have we to thank several, or only a single individual for the suggestion? Does the desire emanate from the front or from the platform, from the conductor, or a performer, or, peradventure, even from the composer himself? Notions of a more stirring kind may, of course, be associated with the announcement on the bills of "unanimous desire," calling up, as it does, visions of a bursting post-bag, or of a deputation as numerous as the audience itself, if not of a crowded preliminary meeting at St. James's Hall, with one of the concert's most persistent frequenters in the chair, with speeches, shows of hands, and a final resolution enthusiastically carried. There have been occasions within the memory of man when a certain tameness noticeable in the reception accorded after all to a "unanimously desired" performance has had the appearance of something like an anti-climax to all these scenes of excitement and tumultuous demand which may fairly be imagined to have occurred beforehand; but the ways of the public are often inscrutable, and it is quite conceivable after their appetite has been thoroughly appeased by the much longed-for repetition, that the dulness of satiety may occasionally supervene. There is no occasion to point out, however, that the wish to hear for a second time some performance possessed of distinctive features or some new work that has made a favourable first impression, is both a natural one and altogether worthy of encouragement. Those, indeed, who give concerts, are but fulfilling their legitimate functions, while furthering their own interests, when they readily respond to it. A little time ago, for example, the young violinist Marteau played, and Dr. Mackenzie's "Twelfth Night" overture was given at two successive Richter concerts. Although we may, if we please, amuse ourselves by innocent speculation, with regard to the quarter in which desire for the repetitions in question was first expressed, no one, we imagine, will be inclined to question the appropriateness of those repetitions. Another satisfactory consideration connected with second performances given "by desire," should not be overlooked; in that they supply a much needed antidote to what some complainants in our correspondence columns—who seem, as a rule, to be rather fond of vituperative nick-names—used to dub the "encore nuisance." In this case, at any rate, persons demanding a double portion, show their willingness to give double pay.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Mr. Harris, who is the wisest of managers, has shown his wisdom by recognising that in the Handel Festival there was so strong an attraction for the concert-going public, that it was useless to try to allure them to Covent Garden by the presentation of any very startling programme. Consequently the festival week was remarkable only for the production of "The Magic Flute," while—perhaps to allow his public time to recover from their pilgrimages to the Crystal Palace—Mr. Harris has offered nothing more startling during the present week than "Un Ballo in Maschera." This, however, drew a good audience, which indeed is scarcely wonderful, considering the good cast. The book of the opera is perhaps weak, but the genius of Verdi is able to vivify such a plot, and to make of it a strongly and permanently attractive work. The singing of such artists as Mdme. Scalchi, Miss Arnoldson, M. Jean de Reszke, and M. Lassalle is always to be listened to with interest, whatever parts they may play, and the performance of Tuesday derived additional interest from the appearance of Mdme. Rolla. This lady is an intelligent actress and singer, and possesses a voice of good quality in its middle register, though the upper notes are less satisfactory. On the occasion in question she undertook the part of Amelia with considerable success. M. Jean de Reszke, as the Duke Riccardo, who disregards court etiquette in so melodramatic a fashion, sang in his most admirable manner. Mdme. Scalchi played the part of the witch, a part, it may be said, which gives her scope for the display of some of her best characteristics, and of which she took the fullest advantage. Miss Arnoldson was in every way charming as the page, Oscar, singing and acting throughout in her most graceful way. As the husband of Amelia, M. Lassalle was very impressive, his rendering of "Eri tu" being especially fine. The orchestra, under Signor Mancinelli's conductorship, was eminently satisfactory.

On Wednesday afternoon the second operatic concert was given at St. James's Hall by the artistes from Covent Garden, when a large audience assembled. We have called the concert operatic, but though the constituents of the programme were drawn from opera, there was a fair seletion of lighter pieces. Amongst the latter it is perhaps permissible to include "Home, sweet home," sung charmingly by Miss Arnoldson, who also gave Eckert's "Echo" song. Madame Albani contributed the Prayer and Barcarolle from "L'Etoile du Nord," in which she won great success, the audience loudly demanding, and obtaining, a repetition. It need not be told with what grace and archness Mdme. Nordica sang the "Jewel Song" from "Faust," and it is sufficient to add that the interpretation by Signor Ravelli of M'ehul's "Vainement Pharaon," by Signor D'Andrade of Faure's "Santa Maria," and by M. Edouard de Reszke of the "Infelice" from "Ernani" were amongst the most interesting features of a concert which, of its class, was extremely good throughout.

Concerts.

MR. THOMAS'S HARP RECITAL.

The harp is so inseparably associated in the mind with Wales and Welshmen, that it is no wonder that a large audience assembled on the occasion of Mr. John Thomas's annual grand harp concert. The feature this year was undoubtedly the band of 22 harps, which, under the conductorship of the concert giver, played several of his compositions; in fact, with but few exceptions, a long programme was made up of compositions and arrangements by Mr. Thomas. The instrumental honours of the day fell first to Her Majesty's harpist, who, with unusual modesty appeared but twice as a soloist. It would be but a gilding of refined gold to praise Mr. Thomas here; he is deservedly at the head of his profession. Second in order we must mention Mdlle. Clara Eissler; her remarkable comniand of her instrument being chiefly shown in a grand duet, in E flat minor, for two harps, by Mr. John Thomas. Of the vocalists Mdme. Edith Wynne sang "Kathleen Mavourneen" magnificently. Miss Hilda Wilson was successful also with Wallace's "Fireside song," and Miss Liza Lehmann sang with almost entire perfection of style a romanza from "Otello." A new song, "The maiden and the sunbeam," fell to the lot of Miss Eleanor Rees. Mr. Dan Price, one of our most promising young baritones, and Mr. James Sauvage were well received. The band of harps comprised Miss Adelaide Arnold, Miss Lucretia Arnold, Miss Ida Audain, Miss Barnby, Miss Florence Chaplin, Miss Fanny Davies, Miss Mary Davies, Miss Emily Dixon, Mdlle. Clara Eissler, Miss Nellie Gunston, Miss Margaret Hingston, Miss Gwyneth James, Miss Edith Jones, Miss Rachel Phelps, Miss Lizzie Pope, Miss Alice Smith, Miss Viola Trust, Mrs. Thomas Finer, Mrs. Alen Palmer, Mrs. John Thomas, Mr. Edward Williams, and Mr. T. H. Wright.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

The penultimate concert of the season took place on Monday night, when an unusually varied and interesting programme was presented. One of its most important features was the closing scene from the first act of "Siegfried," in which Mr. Edward Lloyd took the chief part. Without the aid of stage accessories, this part presents formidable difficulties to the singer who would not only render it in a technically perfect way, but also make the scene intelligible to a concert-room audience. Both of these objects were accomplished by Mr. Lloyd, who interpreted the beautiful music in his most admirable manner, and who is to be congratulated on having added this to his Wagnerian repertory. Mr. William Nicholl was Mime, and both singers were enthusiastically recalled. A Concerto in F minor, by Bach, was a novelty to Richter audiences, and proved a very interesting work. The solo violin part was played by Mr. Ernest Schiever, who is the able leader of the Richter Band, and who acquitted himself of his task in a very laudable way, his tone being uniformly good, and his execution not less satisfactory. The overture to "Oberon" and Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" were also included in the programme, the last of which received an especially fine interpretation. The concluding item of the programme was Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, in A, which was played splendidly. At the last concert of the season, which takes place on Monday next, Beethoven's Mass in D will be performed.

SIR CHARLES HALLE'S CHAMBER CONCERTS.

True to his praiseworthy purpose, Sir Charles Hallé produced some important novelties and quasi novelties during the remainder of the present series of his highly interesting chamber concerts at St. James's Hall, among which special mention is due to Ed. Lalo's Pianoforte Trio No. 3 in A minor, op 36, being characterised by much originality of invention, vigour, and boldness amounting at times to genuine power. A hearing of this work decidedly enhances the desire for an acquaintance with the composer's "Roi d' Ys," the latest and apparently a genuine Parisian operatic success. A pianoforte trio (MS.) somewhat oddly styled "Intermezzo," by Stephen Heller (erroneously described as a French composer by a contemporary, Heller being born in Budapesth, and educated at Vienna), bears, like all his (too much neglected) works, the "cachet" of a refined artist. The perhaps somewhat overrated Robert Volkmann was represented by his seldom heard trio in B flat minor, op. 5, and the, if unequal yet always melodious, attractive, and not nearly sufficiently exploité Anton Rubinstein, by his fine trio No. 4, op. 85 in A minor. The incomparable Mdme. Norman-Neruda (violin) and Herr Franz Neruda (violoncello) had, with the veteran bénéficiaire, the lion's share in these artistic performances, which it may be hoped will be resumed next year and for many years to come.

MDLLE. OTTA BRONNUM'S CONCERT.

Mdlle. Otta Brönnum, who is the latest and certainly one of the most promising additions to the list of Scandinavian singers, gave her first concert at Steinway Hall, on Wednesday evening. Those who heard this young lady at the Albert Hall, on the occasion of the opening of the Anglo-Danish Exhibition, had formed high expectations of her powers. These expectations were certainly justified by her performance on Wednesday, when she gave evidence of the possession of a flexible and sympathetic soprano voice of beautiful quality and good compass. Add to these the emotional qualities of a genuine artist, which are displayed to a degree unusual in so young a singer, and it will be seen that Mdlle. Brönnum is likely to prove a valuable acquisition to the English stage. Her versatility was shown by her performances of songs in five or six languages, including Kjerulf's exquisite "Last Night," Tosti's "Penso," pieces in Danish and Norwegian, besides the famous duet from "Il Barbiere," given with Signor Carpi, and Rubinstein's "Wanderer's Night Song," with Herr Grevillius. When her voice and style have been matured by time and experience, Mdlle. Brönnum will achieve much. It remains only to be said that she was assisted on the present occasion by, amongst others, Mdlle. Marie de Lido, who sang her favourite cavatina from Bizet's "I Pescatori," "La notte e serena," and M. Travers's "Stars of the summer night" in her best style; by Signor Vittorio Carpi, who, besides the duet already referred to, sang Guaranta's "Serenata Olandese" and Yradier's "El Sol de Sevilla" in a way that evoked much enthusiasm; by Mdlle. Galitzin, Mr. Reginald Groome, Signor Abramoff, Chev. B. Palmieri, and M. Johannes Wolff. Mdlle. Thénard, and M. de Mey also delighted the crowded audience with some highly-amusing French recitations.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Madame Della Valle's first concert was given at St. James's Hall on Saturday last, to a crowded and fashionable audience. Miss Marguerite Macintyre, Mdlle. L. Lablache, and Signor D'Andrade appeared, and in their hands it is needless to say the principal portion of the programme was perfectly safe. Mdlle. Lablache sang Wakefield's "No! Sir" and "Nobil Signor" from "Gli Ugonotti" very effectively, and Signor D'Andrade's rendering of Faure's "Charité" was magnificent. He also joined Miss Macintyre in "La ci darem." Miss Alice Steel, Miss Anita Alameda, Mr. Koch, and others assisted with various degrees of success. Mr. Gustave Ernest was the solo pianist, and Herr Waldemar Meyer (accompanied by the Countess Breda) delighted all with an "Andante Religioso," by Thorne, and a "Hungarian Dance" of his own composition, and, in response to a hearty recall, played a Berceuse by Faure. Signori Romili and Bisaccia were the conductors.

Miss Constance Lardelli gave a most successful first concert at Steinway Hall, last Saturdry. This young lady has a charming and sympathetic soprano voice, of considerable quality and compass, which was well displayed in "Angels, ever bright and fair," a "Romanza," by Donizetti; a charming song, by Ernest Birch, "The parting hour," and in a couple of duets, "Il Convegno" and "Estudiantina," in which she was joined by Mr. W. H. Cummings and Mr. E. Birch respectively. These gentlemen also contributed some songs in their usual artistic and effective style. Madame Landon also assisted, while Signor Li Calsi (piano), and Mr. Leo Stern ('cello), gave some admirable solos. Signor Li Calsi and Miss Bessie Waugh were at the piano.

Mr. George Cox gave his annual concert at Steinway Hall on Monday last, when a large audience thoroughly appreciated an excellent programme. Mr. Cox sang with much expression Lady Arthur Hill's "Homing," and Miss Rosalind Ellicott's "My love is near," both charming songs, and admirably suited to his well-trained and effective voice. Mdlle. Marie de Lido, Mdlle. Carlotta Desvignes, Miss Lucille Saunders (who was encored for Lawrence Kellie's "Autumn story"), Miss Helen Lloyd, Miss Nellie Levy, Mr. E. Birch, Mr. F. King, and Mr. Walter Clifford all added to the success of the concert. Mr. Ralph Livings played the Wagner-Liszt "Spinnerlied," and Mdlle. Juliette Folville not only played a violin Fantasia by Vieuxtemps (admirably accompanied by Mr. Krall) with such brilliancy and effect as to obtain an encore, but later on showed her versatility by contributing a piano solo. Mr. Wilfred Bendall took the chief share of the accompanying.

Miss Thekla Friedlaender gave a highly interesting concert on Wednesday evening, last week, at the Portman Rooms, when she was assisted by Miss Agnes Zimmermann and Signor Piatti. Miss Friedlaender sang with much power, and gave evidence of cultured and artistic feeling, achieving her most distinct success in songs by Grieg and Rubinstein. Miss Zimmermann played pieces by Schumann and Scarlatti, and Signor Piatti gave an admirable rendering of his own Nocturne. We regret to learn that this was Miss Friedlaender's farewell concert before her final return to Germany.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel gave their second and last vocal recitals on Wednesday, which had been postponed from June 18th, at the Princes' Hall. The programme was an excellent one, including, as it did, a recitative and air from Handel's "Alessandro," Brahms's "Meine Liebe ist grün," Liszt's "Die Loreley," and Henschel's "Adieux de l'Hôtesse Arabe" and four of his "Lieder im Volkston" sung by Mrs. Henschel; five songs from the "Cyclus" "Die Schöne Müllerin," by Schubert; Lœwe's "Der Erlkonig," Mendelssohn's "Jagdlied," and Grieg's "Ich liebe dich" sung by Mr. Henschel, and duets by Paisiello, Saint Saëns, and Donizetti. Mrs. Henschel sang with her usual correctness and purity of tone, and Mr. Henschel with dramatic force; both were in good voice, and numerous recalls testified to the appreciation of the audience, which completely filled the Hall.

Although Mdlle. Jeanne Douste is not quite juvenile enough to rank amongst the infant prodigies, she is young and talented and altogether attractive enough to draw a very large audience, and her fourth recital on Saturday was no exception to the rule. She executed Bach's Italian Concerto with peculiar neatness and grace, triumphantly conquering the difficulties which were made greater by the heavy touch of the instrument on which she performed; while in Chopin's G minor Ballade, and in several other solos by that composer, the same charm of expression and fairy-like lightness of execution were displayed. That she somewhat lacked power in the bravura passages is not surprising in so young a pianist. The extended broken chords in Chopin's E flat Study are trying enough for pianists blessed with large hands, but Mdlle. Douste's small fingers executed them with wonderful correctness and elasticity. The excellence of her ensemble playing was manifested in a trio by Saint-Saëns, in which she was ably assisted by Messrs. Ludwig and Whitehouse. She also played light pieces by Hans von Bülow, Mendelssohn, Francesco Berger, and Küllak.

A violin and harp recital of a most interesting nature was given on Monday last, at Princes' Hall, by Mdlles. Marianne and Clara Eissler. These young ladies are rapidly making good their claims to rank as mature artists, for not only do they individually exhibit surprising technical powers, but also possess to a high degree the genuine artistic faculty. It will be remembered by all who were present at Mdme. Nilsson's Farewell Concert that the violin solo by Mdlle. Marianne Eissler was by no means the least interesting performance on that memorable occasion, and the way in which she acquitted herself on Monday deepened the impression made at the former concert. On this occasion Mdlle. Eissler contributed Francesco Berger's "Cavatina," Papini's "Romance," and one of Senor Sarasate's "Spanish Dances," beside selections from Mozart and Bach. In all of these, deep and genuine musicianly feeling were apparent, and the performance of the Spanish dance was an admirable display of technical ability. Mdlle. Clara Eissler's harp solos were not less excellent, including Parish Alvar's fantasia, "La Mandoline," John Thomas's "Romance," and a concert study, by Godefroid. More limited in range of expression than the violin, the harp is, nevertheless, in good hands, an instrument capable of very great expression, and it was so on the present occasion. The two sisters also took part in a performance of the "Allegro brillante," from Spohr's Sonata, op. 113; and again, with Mdlle. Emmy Eissler, in the interpretation of Mendelssohn's "Prelude," arranged by John Thomas. A further addition to this gifted family was made, in the person of Mdlle. Frida Eissler, a pianist of much ability, who played excellently Rubinstein's "Melody, in F," and Liszt's "Waldesrauschen." Mrs. Edmeston and Mr. Herbert Thorndike were the vocalists.

Madame Thea Sanderini gave a concert at Collard's Rooms, on Tuesday afternoon, which proved to be of considerable interest. The concert-giver's chief contributions to the programme were Gounod's "Ave Maria," the violin obbligato to which was played by Signor Erba, and Denza's "Tu manchi o Fior." She also joined Mr. H. Williams in the duet from "Traviata," "Parigi o Cara," and in all these showed herself the possessor of a good and well-trained voice. Madame Belle Cole gave admirable interpretations of songs which were in most cases not so good as her singing, and assistance was also given by Mdlle. Leila Dufour, Mdlle. Lebrun, Mr. Walter Clifford, and others. Miss Marie De Grey gave a highly entertaining recitation in a very finished style.

A concert was given on Tuesday afternoon at Princes' Hall, by Herr von Czeke, in aid of the Gordon Boys' Home. Herr von Czeke played several violin solos in a very artistic way, amongst them being Bela's "Hungarian Idyl," and Pierné's "Serenade." The Countess de Bremont, Madame Leibhardt, Mdlle. Jeanne Douste, Mr. Hilton, and Mr. Harper Kearton also sang. The chief interest was created by the performance of a dramatic scena, "Haroun al Raschid," being a setting, by Canon Harford, of Archbishop Trench's poem. There is some very graceful and interesting writing in the little work, and the parts of the Minstrel and the Caliph gave some good opportunities to Mr. Harper Kearton and Mr. Hilton, of which those gentlemen were not slow to avail themselves.

Miss Emma Barker gave a concert on Monday afternoon at Collard's Rooms. This lady's voice is sweet and pure in the upper register, but her singing on this occasion was spoilt by a spasmodic, breathless manner of phrasing, and a slightly nasal manner of voice production, which may have been the result of nervousness. Mdlle. Marie de Lido was encored for her artistic rendering of Hollman's "Chanson d' Amour," in which the 'cello obbligato was played by the composer himself, and her rich voice again gave great pleasure in Mercadante's "Soave immagine." M. Hollman played 'cello solos by Schumann and Chopin, and an Air de Ballet of his own composition, but his contrasts of light and shade and violent crescendos are too extravagant for a really artistic performance. It is a pity that some of his superfluous feeling cannot be accorded to Mr. Douglas Lott, who gave Verdi's "Infèlice!" in a very mechanical and businesslike manner. Miss Eleanor Rees is well known for her effective singing of ballads, and on this occasion she was heard to great advantage in Lovett Kings "Oft I wonder," and the old "I've been roaming." The programme was agreeably varied by two comic songs, cleverly sung by Mr. Eric Lewis, and some recitations by Miss Goad. The concert-giver was also assisted by Mr. Wilhelm Ganz, Signor Carlo Ducci, Mr. Lawrence Kellie, Mr. Bernard Lane, and Mr. Frederic King.

A very amusing entertainment was that given on Wednesday night, by Mr. John Radcliffe and Mdme. Pauline Rita, in the Banqueting Room, St. James's Hall, entitled, "Pan to Pinafore." It consisted nominally of a lecture on the history of the flute, in its many forms, illustrated by performances on various wind instruments of all ages and sorts, and interspersed with songs by Miss Pauline Rita.

Miss Katherine Talbot gave a concert at 32, Grosvenor Square, on Tuesday last, when the concert-giver afforded much pleasure to a large audience by her artistic and refined singing which was heard in several charming ballads The names of Miss Damian, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Laurence Kellie, and Herr Poznanski, are sufficient guarantee of the excellence of the remainder of the programme.

Madame Laura Zagury, the Court Singer to the King and Queen of Portugal, gave an afternoon concert on Monday, at 127, Queen's Gate, when she met with considerable success in her rendering of various classical and popular airs, notably the famous one from "Linda," which seemed to display her excellent voice and style to great advantage. She received valuable aid from Miss Adèle Myers and Mr. William Nicholl, who, besides their solos, gave together Miss Carmichael's "Daybreak," and by Herr Waldemar Meyer.

Mrs. Bartholomew, who is perhaps better remembered by amateurs as Miss Shackle, gave a very interesting concert, on Tuesday afternoon, at the Steinway Hall. The bénéficiare was very successful in her renderings of Dessauer's "To Sevilla," and Gounod's "Ave Maria," which she sung in a highly artistic way, that found instant favour with her audience. Mrs. Bartholomew also joined Miss Hilda Wilson in two charming duets, by Miss Mary Carmichael. Assistance was also given by Mr. Frederic King, Mr. Arthur Thompson, Mr. W. Foxon, Miss Lucy Riley, and others.

Miss Josephine Agabeg is to be congratulated on the success of her annual pupils' concert. Intelligence on the part of the pupils, and evidence of careful and artistic training by the teacher, gave an amount of interest to the performance that is too often missing in more ambitious attempts. The playing of Miss Ellen Nicol, Miss Sorgoudge, Miss Adelina Ganz, the Misses Waterhouse, and Miss Candy was extremely good. The proceedings were agreeably varied by songs from Miss Mary Belval, Miss Ida Agabeg (who sang a pretty song of the drawing-room type, by Miss Josephine Agabeg, "Shadows of the heart"), and Miss Florence Hipwell, who was in splendid voice, and was very successful with Hope Temple's "My lady's bower."

In the great Hall of Dulwich College on Tuesday, July 3rd, Mr. W. H. Cummings gave a concert in aid of the building fund of All Saints' Church. Mr. Cummings himself was heard to great advantage in Blumenthal's "Message," Dibdin's "Tom Bowling," and "Sally in our alley." His son, Mr. Norman Cummings, who has, we believe, just returned from a lengthened course of tuition in Germany, played Mendelssohn's Capriccio in B minor, Schubert's "Impromptu," and Schumann's "Arabesque" in good style. Other able assistance was given by Miss Esmée Woodford, Miss Constance Cardelli, Miss Dora Barnard, Miss Alice Suter, Mr. W. R. Cheesman, and Mr. Frank May. Mr. Fountain Meen played the accompaniments.

ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS.

You are kindly requested to write for Ainsworth's "New Patent Organ Pedal Combination List." Ainsworth's "New Patent" is perfectly unique and may be combined easily with any Piano. It is the only one which may be safely combined with any Piano without deteriorating the instrument. Having put down at my works two engines and machinery of the most desirable kind, I am now supplying my goods at a price which enables every organist and organ student to have always ready for use in his Studio an

ORGAN PEDAL PIANO,

Affording Perfectly Unique Pedal Practice.

34, Sheen Park, Richmond.

Dear Sir,—I have deferred writing to comment upon your Pedals and Action now attached to my pianoforte until I could satisfy myself of their utility and efficiency. I can now conscientiously say that they more than fulfil all my anticipations. Although I am no carpenter, aided by your lucid diagram I had little difficulty in attaching them myself, and it is impossible to over-estimate the comfort they give to me or to conceive the saving of time one experiences in one's own room.—Believe me, yours truly,

BURNHAM HORNER, F.R. Hist.S.

To Mr. Mr. Ainsworth.

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to bear testimony to the perfection of your Invention. I am more than satisfied with your Patent Action and Organ Pedals, and consider them worth double the money. Organists and organ students who desire to improve in the Art of Pedalling, which is so essential to a good organist, will do well to procure a set. I have seen no Action half so effective, and one can sit at the Piano and play, "Fixed in his everlasting seat," or any other organ music, or organ arrangement with the greatest pleasure. The touch of pedals could not be better, and the action is as you say, "Absolutely free from annoyances." They cannot be too highly recommended, as by their use, rapid progress is certain.—Believe me, sincerely yours,

I. B. Thornton,
Organist, Birstall, Leeds.

Cologne, July 16th, 1886.

My Dear Sir,—I have much pleasure in informing you that your Pedals have given the fullest satisfaction. I have them combined with my practice Piano. Many of my musical friends who have seen them, as well as my organ pupils, are quite delighted with them; and I must acknowledge that I have never met with any Pedals so noiseless and pleasant to play upon as yours. The Action I consider durable, and of very good workmanship. Every organist who desires to perfect his playing will welcome your invention. I can recommend your goods in every respect.—Yours truly,

Herr J. RODENKIRCHEN.

A GUIDE FOR PIANOFORTE STUDENTS
BY RIDLEY PRENTICE.

CONTAINS ANALYSES OF WELL-KNOWN PIECES PROGRESSIVELY ARRANGED, ENABLING THE PUPIL TO UNITE A STUDY OF MUSICAL FORM WITH THE ORDINARY PIANOFORTE PRACTICE.

Saturday Review.—"We are far from suggesting that there is any royal road for acquiring technical knowledge, but we are quite certain Mr. Ridley Prentice's road is in every way the pleasantest that has yet been laid before any pianoforte student."

Academy.—"A knowledge of form is imparted in simple and pleasant language. We heartily commend it to all who desire to understand, satisfactorily interpret, and enjoy beautiful music."

Graphic.—"Written with the laudable purpose of helping the pianoforte student to understand and enjoy beautiful music."

Facts and Comments.

Passing the Lyceum last Saturday night, on his way to Covent Garden Opera, a correspondent noticed a lady struggling with the weight of a huge wreath, one of the many floral offerings which were tendered by ardent and grateful admirers on the occasion of Miss Ellen Terry's farewell appearance for this season. It was impossible for him to avoid recalling the little circumstance later on in the same evening, when witnessing a tribute of similar character, but with a difference, of which the new Carmen was recipient between the acts. The difference alluded to was this—that whereas the presentation to an old established favourite, in whose case there would have been nothing out of the way in some pre-arranged manifestation of public appreciation, was enacted privately between the scenes, these outward and visible signs of success—manifestly got ready before that success had actually been achieved—were accorded to a débutante in full view of the audience.

Not the least among the several objections to this system of loading artists with flowers on the stage, is the fact that it cannot fail to detract, by the air of artificiality thus given to the proceedings, from spontaneous marks of approval, such, for instance, as the new Carmen received and fairly earned. There is something particularly illogical in these first night offerings. Had the débutante, instead of making the favourable impression she did, acquitted herself ever so badly, no one in his senses will doubt that the victor's crown, or its equivalent, would have been proffered, amid exclamations, all the same.

A pretty idea, prettily carried out, came as a pleasant surprise the other Sunday to Herr Meyer Lutz, when the choir boys of St. George's, Southwark, presented him with a silver mounted bâton, in affectionate recognition of his long and distinguished services as organist in that cathedral, a post which he has filled for 40 years.

There is rumour of another pianoforte prodigy in the person of Miss Gussy Cottlon, of Chicago, aged ten, who shortly hopes to attract audiences in London of a size such as adult virtuosos of acknowledged eminence have for the most part failed in getting together during the last season. But in view of the ever-increasing supply of clever children, has not the time almost arrived when the word "prodigy" will have to be abandoned?

With a view to enabling the Japanese to "see themselves as others see them," a revelation which in this case is likely to be full of surprises, there is a project on foot in San Francisco of producing the "Mikado" in Japanese.

One is glad to see that the spirit of Chauvinism which has affected France and Germany with more or less violence, is at least sunk for a season, when the two nations meet on neutral musical grounds. The band of the Republican Guards recently visited Liège to take part in the Grètry Commemoration, and amongst those who received the French musicians at the station, was a local German singing club, Concordia by name, which headed the procession on its way into the ancient city.

It is stated that M. Tschaikowski, the Russian composer, will conduct an orchestra which is to give concerts in various towns of Sweden and Norway during the coming winter. M. Tschaikowski is an excellent conductor, as those who saw him direct the Philharmonic orchestra will testify.

Madame Marie Roze is making a tour through the provincial cities of France, and if newspapers may be believed, her success seems to be all that her warmest friends could desire.

The new "Mass" and "Te Deum" which Gounod recently conducted at the Cathedral of Rheims is to be performed in Paris, at the church of Ste Eustache, next autumn by a chorus of five hundred voices, accompanied in the "Te Deum" by twenty harps.

M. Reyer is hard at work on his new opera, "Salammbo." The directors of the Monnaie Theatre, of Brussels, wish to produce the work, but there is still some hope that it may see the light at the Grand Opéra.

Signor Martucci, who is directing the musical arrangements of the Bologna Exhibition, of which an account appeared in our columns a short time since, has had a career which might well excite the envy of older musicians. He is the son of a military bandmaster, and while prosecuting his studies at the Conservatoire of Naples, he soon obtained recognition of his great talents both as a composer and a pianist. As a conductor also, he was so wonderfully successful, that, when, two years ago, the conductor then employed suddenly threw up his position at Bologna, Signor Martucci, in spite of his youth, was offered the double post of director of the Lycée Musical, and of the Théâtre Communal. During the exhibition he has conducted a series of important concerts, in the programmes of which, amongst other things, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," and Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture have had place. Altogether, Signor Martucci, who is scarcely thirty years of age, is one of the most noticeable figures amongst contemporary musicians in Italy.

It is but just to the Prince de Chandernagore, whose tragic history we related a short time since, to state that he has been released from the vile dungeon into which he was thrown at the instance of the irate mother of the lady whom, in his musical ardour, it was alleged he had abducted.

We regret to announce the death of Herr Franz Leideritz, who died suddenly at Hampstead on the 29th ultimo. Herr Leideritz was well-known in Germany, where for many years he had conducted opera, his last engagement of this kind being at the Leipzig Opera House. The deceased had been for the last four years a resident in this country, and had devoted himself to musical composition, his chief work being a grand opera, which was completed only shortly before his death. Herr Leideritz was a talented and conscientious musician, and his many friends will learn with sincere regret that a life of so much promise should have closed so prematurely.

An afternoon concert will be given at the Town Hall, Kensington, on July 23rd, at 3.30, under the direction of Mr. E. H. Turpin and Mr. Wilfred Bendall, for the benefit of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, and to enable him to obtain the necessary rest and change after his late severe accident (by which he has temporarily lost the use of his left arm). Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Marguerite Hall, Miss Emily Lawson, Mr. Herbert Thorndike, Mr. John Probert, Miss Mary Carmichael, Signor Erba, Mr. Hermann Vezin, and other artists have kindly given their services. Tickets may be obtained of Mr. Heseltine Owen, 3, Melborne Grove, The Boltons, S.W., who will gladly receive any subscriptions towards the benefit fund. Tickets can also be obtained from Mrs. Malcolm Lawson, 21, Charlton Villas, Harlesden, N.W.

A Fancy Fair will be held on the 17th of July, and three successive days, in the Old Irish Market Place, at the Exhibition, now open at Olympia, which promises to be a very attractive affair. The "Music and Literature" stall will be presided over by Lady Arthur Hill, the Marchioness of Downshire, and other ladies well-known in the fashionable world.

Mr. Emanuel Nelson announces an evening concert, at Princes' Hall, on Thursday next. Mr. Nelson has been known for nearly thirty years as a director of concerts, and presents an attractive programme.

The Nemesis which dogs the footsteps of all over-zealous people who parade before the world the juvenile productions of great men has not been tardy in overtaking those who have been instrumental in unearthing the two immature operas of Wagner, "The Fairies" and "The Novice of Palermo," against the revival of which we have already protested. It seems, however, that Nemesis has hardly caught the right victims. The score of the first work referred to was in an extremely small writing, and, indeed, was in some places almost illegible, and those entrusted with the process of copying them had such a difficult task that they have been attacked with a serious ocular disease, which, indeed, threatens their vision altogether. The process of copying the second score is likely to be still more difficult. But it certainly is unfortunate that the innocent copyists should be chosen for this punishment, which should rather have fallen on the "resurrectionists" who will not let the still-born children of great men rest in their graves.

"If any of our readers," says "Freund's Music and Drama," "will compare the repertoire of operas that have been given at the Metropolitan Opera House last season, with that which is presented to the London music lovers just now at Covent Garden, under Mr. Harris's management, they will at once perceive how infinitely higher a standard of musical art has been reached in this city than in London, the metropolis of the world. At the latter the "Lucrezias," "Puritani," "Sonnambulas," "Traviatas," and other hysterical and lachrymose people make their cheerful round. A work like "Carmen," with Minnie Hauk in the title part, is considered an exciting attraction. We have had here during the last winter the masterpieces of the greatest composer of dramatic music the world has ever seen. With the exception of one drama—"Das Rheingold," which will be produced next season—we have had the complete cycle of the "Nibelungen." We have had "Tristan und Isolde," with an occasional performance of "Lohengrin" and "Tannhäuser" thrown in. The fact is that in London, the great centre of Italian operatic music, the opera to this day is a merely fashionable entertainment where society meets after dinner to discuss the affairs of fashionable life, talk scandal, and criticise each other. True, we have a good deal of that among the inmates of the boxes in our own Metropolitan, but the vast majority who occupy seats in the orchestra and in the three galleries above the boxes are earnest, cultivated people who come for one purpose only, that of hearing the greatest works of dramatic music that have been created, performed in as artistic a manner as can only be witnessed at three or four of the great opera houses of the old world." This is "tall talk," but it has certainly a grain of truth in it, and is not a little suggestive to those who care for the condition of English art.

However, in the face of such facts as these, over which our cousins are making so joyful, it is a little amusing to read of the following incident, which seems to prove that, however far ahead of us Americans may be in the matter of Wagner's operas, there is one sort of musical performance which they have not as yet brought to absolute perfection. It seems that in Albany, U.S.A., there lived a musician of credit and renown in his own locality. In the absence of adverse evidence, it is fair to assume that he was a respectable and respected person, who, in his way, did service to the cause of art. It came to pass at last that this musician died, for not even American artists are immortal. So far there is nothing singular in his history. The pathetic part of it, however, is yet to come. The day for the funeral of the defunct musician was appointed; the cortège set out, amidst lamentations loud and long, and was met at the grave by a body of singers—possibly pupils of the deceased—who had come to grace the obsequies with tender strains that should tell of the love and reverence they had borne him. They ranged themselves in order; there were preliminary whisperings and looks; and they opened the copies of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," which they all carried. The mourners waited, hushed, expecting to hear the first notes of "Happy and blest are they," or, perhaps, "Be thou faithful unto death," when suddenly they were startled by the denunciatory phrases of "Take him away." "Take him away," shouted tenors and basses, "Take him away," answered sopranos and contraltos, not less fiercely. The chorus ended, and the astonished listeners breathed freely after the whirlwind. But not for long. The choir-leader gave a second signal, and the choir broke out more savagely than ever with "Stone him to death!" Once more the storm of sound arose, in a gradual crescendo of fury; and parson, mourners, and mutes were lost in wonder at the needless anger of the choristers against the unoffending dead. There are no details to hand of the scene that took place when the second chorus was over, though it is safe to surmise that those musicians had to "git," while it is impossible to say what the dead musician's spirit thought of the proceedings. Probably it behaved as did that of the hero whom Pallas slew, in the last book of the Æneid :—

> "Vitaque cum gemitu fugit indignata sub umbras,"

and we fear it will go hardly with those choristers, should they chance to meet the indignant spirit in the shades below.

By Andre de Ternant.

"Bite then your thumb until it bleeds, ungrateful wretches that you are! It is not I who will prevent you from doing so. We, however, receive our hero with applause, follow the procession of his triumph, crying vivat on the way, and once again render thanks to Nicolo Paganini, who has paid for the score more than any modern European monarch would have done. Be happy with us, Nicolo Paganini, you have kissed both Berlioz's hands! May this triumph, of which half belongs to you, restore a little needful strength and life to your body, used up by genius! May the happy news travel over to you on the shore of Genoa, where shines, in all its purity, the beautiful sun of Italy, so that you may know how much we ourselves, who acknowledge having blasphemed against you in a day of anger, are now indebted and devoted to you, Nicolo Paganini!"

When Berlioz's first wife, the once celebrated Irish actress, Henrietta Smithson, died, after a long and painful illness, on the 3rd of March, 1854, Janin, after alluding to the melancholy event in an obituary notice, again drew the attention of his readers to "Roméo et Juliette," and did not fail to mention that it was her performance of Juliet with the English actors which inspired her husband to compose the work. Berlioz seems to have been deeply touched after reading the sympathetic remarks, and in a letter to his only son, written a few days afterwards, he wrote: "I fancy you have seen the charming things which Jules Janin said about your poor mother, in his article of Monday last, and you must have noticed with what delicacy he alluded to my work on "Romeo and Juliet," quoting the words of the funeral march, Fêtes des fleurs, &c.

An incident in the friendship between Janin and Berlioz, which will perhaps interest lovers of music in England more than any other, is connected with the production in Paris of the "Damnation de Faust." It has been frequently performed in London, and all the provincial towns of importance in the United Kingdom, during the last few years, and, up to the present time, is the most popular of all the great French composer's works. Even Berlioz himself remarks in his "Memoires": "I look upon the work as one of the best that I have produced, and up till now the public appear to think with me." These words, however, it must be stated, were written many years after the first performance of the work, in December, 1846, when it was received by the Parisian public with the utmost indifference. "Nothing in my artistic career (Berlioz says) ever more deeply wounded me than this unexpected indifference." A friend in need is a friend indeed. Janin truly was such on every occasion, and after alluding in his weekly Feuilleton to the enthusiastic reception of a long forgotten comedy by Scribe, which was produced in Paris during the same week, he addressed his readers as follows:—

"Did you hear, close to the Opera-comique, to-day at four o'clock, the warmest demonstration of pleasure, and, in truth, the most difficult to obtain? I speak of those praises so painful to draw from the public, which cost the artist the most precious moments of his life, and for which he must suffer the most cruel agonies. Inexorable and contested glory, for ever continual battles against oblivion, which must be gained step by step, by the sweat of the brow, and by the most heartbreaking tortures. Terrible and cruel struggles, endless duels against the man who has the courage, who has the will, and who would rather die than prostitute his art to the stupid will of the public. Happy, thrice happy, are those who can obtain applause like M. Scribe! But I pity them, while I envy those unfortunate persons who must be contented with receiving the same applause as Berlioz."

Many other extracts from Janin's writings might be quoted with advantage in these pages, but the present writer has gone beyond the limits he intended at the outset. In fact, a compilation of all these extracts would form a very interesting volume, and besides an important contribution to the fast growing literature on Berlioz. There is no doubt also that it would generally interest even those readers who care little about music, or understand little about the technicalities of the art, quite as much as Jean Jacques Rousseau's observations on music and musicians in the "Confessions," Goethe's correspondence with his musical friends, Burns's letters to Thomson, the publisher of the Scottish songs, Heine's writings on music, and other similar works. However, it is to be hoped that what has been explained and quoted in these pages will sufficiently depict the remarkable intimacy and unusual sympathy between a literary man and a musician.

Berlioz resigned his post as musical critic on the Journal des Débats, shortly after the ill-fated production of "Les Troyens," at the Théatre Lyrique, in 1863, and was succeeded by M. Reyer, who still holds it. Jules Janin's name continued to appear for some years as the author of the dramatic feuilletons, but he was for the greater part of the time confined to his room by gout and corpulence, and therefore had to trust to literary assistance for the necessary information, and later on he was even unable to do this. In the year of 1869 Berlioz passed away, comparatively unnoticed by the giddy world of Paris, who caused him so much sorrow, but Jules Janin lived to see his friend's compositions resuscitated as those of a French Beethoven in Paris, by MM. Lamoureux, Colonne, and Pasdeloup, who vied with each other in producing his works on the concert platforms, and on the 19th of June, 1874, he died at his country house, at Passy, sitting in the same armchair in which Béranger died.

THE MUSIC OF THE SYNAGOGUE.

In spite of their remarkable conservatism, the Jews have preserved no traces of any national music of their own; and it would be absolutely correct to say that traditional melodies of undoubted antiquity are next to unknown in the service of the synagogue. This is not the general view taken by writers whose ideas are grounded upon the beliefs current among orthodox Jews; for the latter hold some extremely fanciful notions about the origin of the airs to which many of their prayers are sung. The Sephardim, or Southern Jews, assert that the "Shirah," or Song of Moses, as it is chanted in the morning service, is still the identical melody composed and sung by Miriam when the Israelites crossed the Red Sea. The Polish and Northern Jews hold that the air to which they sing the "Oléna Le' Shabeah," or Ascription of Praise, on the New Year and Day of Atonement was expressly taught to Moses the Lawgiver, when he spent forty days on Mount Sinai, and that he afterwards taught it the Israelites. Last year—at a concert given, if we recollect aright, at the St. James's Hall—the "Kol Nidré," or Remission of Vows of the Eve of Atonement, was given as a specimen of synagogue music; and the audience were on that occasion informed that the melody was one of the most ancient preserved among the Jews. As a matter of fact, the melody is comparatively modern, and it is quite unknown to more than half of the Hebrews throughout the world. The Southern Jews have a totally different way of chanting it; while the Eastern Synagogues, following the most ancient custom of all, simply recite the formula. The old Jews—who understood, at all events, the meaning of the Chaldaic words they used—would no more have dreamed of setting a formula like "Kol Nidré" to an air such as the Polish Jews have adopted than the Protestants of this country would think of adapting the Prayer for the Royal Family to a popular chorus.

Rather more than a thousand years ago the Rabbinical schools of Palestine invented a musical system—or, more correctly speaking, a system of musical signs—appropriated to the public "reading of the Law" on Sabbaths and festivals, one of the most important functions of the synagogue. And it is in connection with this "reading" of the Law that one would naturally look for some traces of the ancient music of the Jews. From time immemorial the recitation of the sacred books in the synagogue has been a sort of musical declamation, more or less florid; and the Talmud (Megillah 32, end, for instance) has many references to the employment of certain melodies for the purpose. This mode of recitation was originally propagated through many generations by oral instruction, and, oddly enough, by manual signs. These signs were "made by the right hand," as Talmud Berachoth (62 a) explains, and continued in use long after a written notion was adopted—in Yemen the Arabian Jews still employ them. About the end of the seventh century the synagogues made an attempt to represent the cantillation of the law by a system of written signs introduced in the text. The Greek and Syriac Churches had about this time perfected their systems of musical notation, and this it no doubt was that stirred up the Palestinian Jews to undertake something of the same kind. The result was the adoption of the "neginoth" or "ta'amim," often called "tonic accents," which are marked in every printed Hebrew Bible along with the vowel points. As a musical sign each of these accents denotes an entire musical phrase, and as such embraces several notes—precisely like the neumes of the early Latin Church. In this way the traditional modulation of each word was fixed, and the reader acquainted with the musical value of each sign was furnished with all that was needful for the correct cantillation or recitation of the sacred books. But, while the signs remain unchanged and fixed to this day, the original musical value of the "ta'amim" appears to have been lost in great part if not entirely. The Sephardim and Southern Jews sing them one way; the Polish and Northern Jews in another and totally different fashion; the Karaite Jews have their way of chanting them; the Caucasian Jews have forgotten their musical value; and those of Kurdistan—the most ancient Hebrew communities that exist—do not agree with any of the others in their mode of singing the text of the Pentateuch. Of course the Sephardim maintain that their modulation is the ancient one, and so do the Jews of Northern Europe. But the two modes of recitation have nothing whatever in common—even the rhythm of the signs is dissimilar. Germans and Portuguese differ, moreover, among themselves in the musical value they attach to each "ta'am;" and the utmost that can be said with any certainty is that th Eastern Jews and the Sephardim or Spanish Jews appear t have preserved in their cantillation some traces of the ancient mode of reciting the Law.

If it has fared thus with the musical declamation of the sacred text for which a system of musical signs was actually invented by the Rabbins, it may easily be imagined what has happened in the case of ancient synagogue melodies which no means were taken to preserve. There may, perhaps, be a trace of old Jewish music in the solemn "Benediction of the Priests" on high days and festivals, as chanted in the Spanish and Portuguese synagogues. It is extremely simple, consisting of no more than six notes, repeated for each of the two-and-twenty words forming the blesssing; and the character of the melody is thoroughly Oriental. But then, again, it is unlike the melody of the true Eastern Jews, who have possibly a better tradition, since the continuity of their existence as communal bodies has, in many instances, remained unbroken for more than eighteen centuries. Besides, the Jews of Northern Europe have no fewer than six different and distinct airs to which they chant the Benediction. It seems probable that each of the three or four main divisions of Jews adopted a melody derived and altered a little from the popular music of the country in which they dwelt; for in every case the airs employed in the liturgy of the synagogue have a marked affinity with the national music of the land in which we find them in use. This would account not only for the differences we find existing throughout Jewry, but for the peculiar characteristics of synagogue music wherever we examine it. Of course, some persons may feel disposed to agree with the learned Jew, Dr. De Solla—quoted by Carl Engel in his work on "The Music of the Most Ancient Peoples"—that the very fact of the melodies of the synagogue differing in each country is an additional proof of their common origin and antiquity. But this is not a view likely to commend itself to people with a common-sense regard for the value of evidence. That the Jews should have adopted for liturgical purposes the music of the peoples surrounding them, modified a little by their Eastern predilections, is quite in accordance with what we know to have been their practice in other matters. And it may be worth pointing out that in every country he has visited the writer of this paper has found a marked resemblance between the favourite melodies of the synagogue and the popular airs of the gypsies.—The St. James's Gazette.

VOCAL.

Number 29 of Mr. Joseph Williams's Albums consists of four pleasing vocal duets for soprano and tenor, by Fred. H. Cowen, in which the happy combination of the popular element with a refined and cultivated expression will no doubt procure for them wide acceptance both in the drawing-room and the concert-room. The first two, "Edenland" and "The boy and the brook," words by the author of John Halifax and Longfellow respectively, will attract by their simple melodic interest. A somewhat more elaborate rendering of the poet's intention has been successfully attempted in No. 3, "On her lover's arm she leant," a setting of Tennyson's words, and in No. 4, with Shelley's equally familiar verses, "The fountains mingle with the river," the former, with its fanciful accompaniment, being especially effective. "The gleaner's harvest" is a cantata for female voices, by Charles Harford Lloyd, with words by Jetty Vogel (Novello, Ewer, and Co.). It contains several numbers of melodic interest, besides a clever "canon 2 in 1 at the fourth below." Written by an experienced hand, this little work is sure to go well when undertaken by choral societies of fair efficiency, to whose attention it may be safely recommended. "The fairies' isle" is another cantata for female voices, by Battison Haynes—words by Edward Oxenford (same publishers), and is of lighter texture than the foregoing. A pretty notion is here prettily carried out, and the music, descriptive of the Sicilian maiden's annual offering of flowers to propitiate the fairies supposed to inhabit a rocky island near their coast, flows tunefully and pleasantly throughout.

We have received yet another sheet of "Vocal exercises," designed this time to illustrate the method adopted with his pupils by Mr. Frederic Penna (Novello, Ewer, and Co.), and to these are appended a few letterpress observations, the full significance of which will of course be better apprehended with the aid of a master, or of a certain treatise on singing referred to by the author. Short as they are, the exercises have been constructed and arranged with evident care, and if conscientiously practised, cannot fail to prove useful to vocal students.

BOOKS.

In a little "Manual of Orchestration" recently published by Hamilton Clarke (J. Curwen and Co.) a considerable amount of information concerning the various instruments now used in large and small orchestras, their range, characteristics, and capabilities, has been compressed into a small compass. Designed principally to assist amateurs in the "intelligent following of orchestra music," this little work will be found acceptable to young students as a preparation to the study of larger works; the more so as the author says what he has to say in a general manner, and with manifest enthusiasm for his subject. At the same time he is perhaps needlessly oracular upon "the advent amongst us of certain operas of the modern German school," concerning which he declares that "throughout an entire evening's entertainment he has failed to discern a single fragment of melody or tune;" but as no names are mentioned, the direction in which this shaft is intended to be launched is left in doubt. If, however, the natural surmise is also the correct one, and the works of really great masters representative of the modern school are here aimed at, a little more modesty, and a little less confidence in his own powers at all times to "follow intelligently" may fairly be recommended to the teacher. It will not be the first time, and is not likely to be the last, that complaints of the same kind have been advanced against compositions literally brimful of melody, simply because that melody is not couched in the most familiar phraseology.

A second edition lately published of Mr. Henry C. Bannister's pleasantly written paper upon musical art and study contains an additional essay, entitled, "The enjoyment of music," which was read last year before the College of Organists, and is marked by merits of the kind already referred to in our notice of the previous issue.

A little volume on "Elocution, Voice, and Gesture," by Rupert Garry (Bemrose and Sons), deals with a subject which should have interest for others besides those actually destined for the theatrical profession; for there is scarcely a vocation in life in which the sort of training in speech and personal bearing here indicated may not be fairly regarded as an important, though too often neglected, branch of education. What the professors of dancing and deportment did, or were supposed to do, for the youths of former generations, now comes naturally within the province of the more scientifically qualified elocution master, including, as it does, the cultivation of habits of self-possession, and of other qualities likely to contribute in no small degree to success in life. With regard to the more directly artistic objects in view, these have been subserved by a series of essays, containing hints, set forth with much clearness by an evidently experienced teacher, upon the management of the voice and gesture, a chapter upon vocal remedies, &c. The "annotated precis," given at the end, include, besides the stock selection, some less familiar extracts, with remarks and selections by Mr. Wilson Barrett and Mr. Edward S. Willard, which will not fail to add to the interest of this little book for actors both amateur and professional.

HOW I MADE MY DEBUT IN ITALY.

After several years' preparation, consisting of hard work, self-denial, struggles, and disappointments, I had at length so far attained my object that I could be said to be able to sing. My voice was well "posed," I had conquered the difficulties of "producing" the voice properly, and of managing it. I had studied until I had at my fingers' ends several operas suitable for my light soprano voice. In a word, I was ready to let myself be heard in public. The difficulty which now arose was to find a public ready to hear me. Oh! you who sit at home and dream of the laurels so easily won by singers, if you only knew half the difficulties which (usually) beset the path to fame!

I now first made the acquaintance of the impresario, a being, I found, whose life is rendered laborious by an embarras de richesses. So many would-be Lucias, Rigolettos, Sonnambulas, Trovatores besiege him, that the poor Impresario knows not which way to turn!

After many negotiations and small intrigues, I found myself in possession of a real scrittura—that is a written engagement to sing. I was to make my début as prima donna in the time-honoured "Lucia di Lammermoor," in a small country town near Venice.

"This looks like business at last," remarked my American friend, as we perused the precious document with elation unspeakable, after the departure of the impresario.

It certainly was a business affair, in which I was the payer, however, not the recipient, having had to pay for the risk and the honour of a début a sum which I could ill spare. But the important fact remained. I was to sing on three evenings; I should test my merits in public; my chance had come.

In due time I repaired to O——, a quiet little place with a small theatre, the walls of which were already adorned with placards announcing our performance. I felt no great confidence in the rest of our company, and, unfortunately, the rehearsals did not tend to reassure one. The tenor sang flat, and had a sublime disregard for time, besides being rough and unpolished. The chorus was thin and weak, the orchestra small, and the dramatic soprano, a lady of mature years, who was to sing on alternate nights with myself, took a dislike to me, and lost no opportunity of expressing it openly, which was a worry, if only a minor one. But I resolved to forget all these trifles in devotion to art, and I was by this time prepared to find thorns among the roses of an artistic life. So the evening of my début found me hopeful in spite of many fears and misgivings and horrible fits of nervousness. About two hours before the performance began the impresario arrived "to speak with me on a matter of grave importance." My heart sank as I saw an anxious frown upon his brow, and various frantic gestures indicating despair. What could it be? Was the theatre on fire? or had the public of O—— unanimously refused to hear us?

"My dear Signorina," said the impresario, in a mysterious and awe-inspiring manner, "I come to you in an emergency. Your talent, your youth, and, may I add, your beauty, have awakened a singular interest in me, one which, I may say, I rarely feel for débutantes. Your voice needs only to be heard to be appreciated, and I resolved to procure you the opportunity of being heard. Yet how shall I say it? Even at this last hour the precious opportunity may escape our grasp. The demand for tickets has been very small, the fastidious public of O—— being cautious as to the merits of an unknown prima donna. I have not the least doubt that on your second appearance every seat in the house will be taken. Still, in the meantime, what is to be done? The prospects of the receipts for to-night are so small that positively the other distinguished artists and the orchestra have refused to perform at all, unless a certain sum be guaranteed to cover the deficit of the evening. I appeal to you, Signorina."

Hereupon ensued an explanation, showing that I, the unknown primâ donna, being the apparent cause of the unfortunate deficit (the other artists being already very distinguished celebrities), it clearly behoved me to make it up. I thought of the tenor, and of the baritone (who was, by the way a débutante too), and I might have replied that if these artists were already so well known and so much esteemed by the discriminating public, why then did not their merits outweigh my deficiencies? But I was a novice, it was nearly the hour for my début, and I saw my long coveted chance endangered.

Recklessly, I gave the sum which the impresario declared necessary to guarantee the success of the evening, and that worthy departed evidently relieved in mind.

Half-an-hour later, arrived a messenger from the chef d'orchestre, delicately hinting at the customary douceur due to those indispensable musicians. This sop to Cerebus took the form of 30 francs, which were received by the messenger with a low bow full of mingled dignity and servility. Many were the other sops which I dispensed on this occasion, but it is needless to relate them all.

In spite of all drawbacks, and in spite of nervousness, I felt a glow of triumph when I stood on the boards at last! And after the first plunge I did not feel so very nervous, and sang fairly well, as well as most of the débutantes, whose name is legion. Also I was told that I looked well, an important point.

I was recalled twice, and received three bouquets of flowers (needless to say that I treasured some of them for years). On the following day I was honoured by some highly complimentary verses written on gold-edged paper, by a poetical Count, who had occupied the stage box at the performance, and who had come behind the scenes to be introduced to Lucia The lines began, "Oh! blond and captivating daughter of the North" (I learnt afterwards that the Count wrote verses to every prima donna who appeared at O——. It was a hobby of his, and he had much leisure time at his disposal).

On the whole, I pleased the discriminating public of O—— very well, and I was not called upon to supplement any further deficiencies in the receipts for our performances. Several flattering notices of me appeared in the local papers, and my friends at home imagined me already famous, forgetting that one little corner of Italy is not the world.

My star reached its zenith on the evening of my last appearance in O——. After the opera was over, and just as I was falling asleep, the sound of music beneath the window of my room awoke me. It was the grateful and admiring orchestra who had come to serenade me. I had to appear on the balcony and thank them, and they replied by singing a charming little song with a refrain of "Come again soon and sing to us, &c.," which touched me deeply.

Afterwards I marvelled at the ease of this apparently spontaneous production, but I learnt that it had already been sung to other Lucias before me, and that the serenade was a regular and customary tribute to any prima donna from the orchestra—that is to any prima donna who has not been an utter failure. So the illusion vanished even from my serenade, though it afforded me much amusement afterwards, on comparing notes with other girls who had gone through their débuts with experiences exactly like mine.

I never had a second engagement. I refused to accept another without being paid for my services, and I never found an impresario who was willing to pay me. They all expected me to sing for nothing or to pay them, and I had not time nor money to spend in doing this (serving my apprenticeship as it were), until such time as I should be able to command payment. Being unknown to fame and inexperienced, I could not do so as yet. Shortly afterwards, too, I was obliged to return to England and was unable to leave it for some time. After a year I was again at liberty to turn my attention to my "career," but I decided not to return to Italy, for I could not afford to wait there for "something to turn up." In England I had no chance of a really good engagement, perhaps from want of influence or from want of knowing how to set about it. Also ambition had left me. I no longer pined for the triumphs (and the struggles) of the stage. I suppose I was not really an artist at heart, and I was content to live happily as a private individual at last. I am doing so still.

The Organ World.

ORGAN RENDERING OF ORCHESTRAL ACCOMPANIMENTS.

III.

In connection with this subject, it was lately pointed out that the player's first business, when called to offer an organic version of orchestral accompaniments, is finding something like organ equivalents for the different typical instrumental effects. To realise something of such a duty, one may imagine being placed at the organ keyboard and engaged in fixing upon the mind the chief combinations likely to produce these typical features of organ orchestration. In the first place, two pianissimo string effects should be secured, one for the swell manual as furnished by the soft eight-feet stops, and the other on the choir, or on a two-manual organ on the great, by, say a dulciana alone, or by that stop combined with a stopped diapason when actively-moving or staccato notes have to be enunciated. The reason why parallel effects of this type are wanted will be obvious; the swell pianissimo is needed when there is a likelihood of solo effects being wanted for, say clarionet or flute stops, as are usually found on the choir or great manuals, and the choir subdued string imitation would enable the performer similarly to be prepared for solo sentences presentable on a swell reed, for instance. The next advance will be attaining some equivalent for strings heard in piano medium. Here again the soft eight-feet work of swell and choir are needed, but they require supplementing possibly. Thus, a soft oboe stop on the swell will lend richness to piano string effects on that manual, in sustained harmonies, giving a flavour of the bowing sounds, as Mr. James Higgs thoughtfully pointed out when speaking at a College of Organists' meeting some years ago, on the subject of organ arrangements. Then again, in piano string passages of considerable activity, or of a piquant character, a soft four feet stop on either swell or choir, as swell principal or harmonic flute, or choir soft flute or viol d'amore, will lend great clearness to the harmonies or figures, and may be safely employed without doing violence to any harmonic principle, save when accompanying solo wind instrument effects, in which cases the four feet tone would be detrimental as standing, so to speak, above the pitch of the solo figures in question. Next the stringed mass would find fair organic representation, as in mezzo piano or mezzo forte tone medium on the great diapason work, either alone or coupled to the swell, with eight feet stops and soft reed. The stringed mass of the orchestra playing in medium tone may be described as the orchestral representation of that grand organic effect, the great diapason work. Increased decision, rapid movement, or pointed phrasing may justify the use of some more or less telling four feet stop, such harmonic brilliancy being distinctly felt in the mass of stringed instruments when engaged in the enunciation of strongly phrased and vigorously bowed sentences.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS' EXAMINATION.

An exceptionally large number of candidates present themselves for examination during the next two weeks. The arrangements are duly completed, and the diplomas gained will be presented each week at the close of the examination. The presence of that distinguished musician, Dr. Garratt, M.A., of Cambridge, as a distributor of diplomas, will be an interesting event. The diplomas will be distributed on Friday next, July 20th, and on July 27th at the Bloomsbury Hall, Hart Street, at 11.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE RENAISSANCE ON MUSIC.

III.

In his history of the renaissance, Mr. Symonds has happily said* that the discovery of Giotto by Cimabue, may be treated as the parable of the renaissance. Cimabue found the shepherd boy, Giotto, not tracing mosaics inside a church, but on the open mountain, trying to draw the portrait of one of his own sheep from the life. What, therefore, we have to look for in music is something akin to this study from Nature, something realistic rather than mystical, something in which ideas are taken from what surrounds man, and is external to him, rather than from what he feels, and is internal.

It appears that, in 1475, Poliziano, the tutor of Leo X. (that Pope who, in that he was artist rather than priest, was so typical of the renaissance which he fostered, and who was himself a musician), wrote a drama called "Orfeo," taking for his subject the story which has ever since been a favourite classic for dramatic treatment. This drama was written a century before men had thought of making an attempt at anything deserving to be called by the name of opera, but it has to be mentioned as the first step in a new direction, which was ultimately to land men in the opera. It was a departure from the old sacred plays, it was the treatment of a secular subject on the stage; and it was something more important, it was the treatment of a classical subject. That is, it was the direct product of renaissance feeling of the best kind. It was not the mere copying or translation of a classical work, but it was original thought, bearing the impress of classical study, in this respect exactly corresponding with the early architecture of the renaissance, in which the architects did not copy the buildings of antiquity, but, having studied those buildings, worked out their own original designs with minds impressed with a feeling for classical details.

And from that date dramas based on classical subjects, and thereby distinctly showing the influence of the renaissance, were written from time to time. As soon as these dramas came to be interspersed with incidental music, another step towards the possibility of a musical drama was made. But still there was a very large distance to be travelled. This distance was diminished as the music became more associated with the subject of the drama. But while the music continued to be incidental, it could not be said that the drama was musical drama. The drama in itself was complete without the music, and the incidental airs and choruses were complete in themselves, and did not develop the plot; on the contrary, they so far militated against the drama that the action of the play had to be stopped to admit of the performance of the music, and in turn the music had to cease to allow of the resumption of the play. There was as yet no real combination of the two arts. At last, in 1580, three men of names well known in Florentine history—a Bardi, a Corsi, and a Strozzi—associated themselves together, with the deliberate idea of trying to revive the music used by the Greeks to accompany their dramas, for the purpose of aiding in the dramatic development of the plot. These three amateurs, to whom we owe so much, used to meet in the Palazzo Bardi—that solemn grey building with its silent windows looking northwards down upon the narrow Via dei Bardi, so different from the brilliant stage effects to which the studies of its occupants would give rise.

In classical authors descriptions of the manner in which the music was performed were to be found, descriptions of the instruments were to be found; but what the music exactly was, was not to be found. One thing, however, was ascertained that the music essentially followed the action of the drama, and was used to intensify the meaning of the words. And this was an entirely new idea. With the old Ambrosian tones directions were given as to the inflections to be used at a comma, at a colon, at a full stop, at a note of interrogation; so that careful attention was paid to punctuation. But the same reciting notes might be used for prayer or for praise, for words of Easter joy or words of Lenten sadness; and as time went on, and greater development was shown in the music, less attention was bestowed on the words. The men who mixed up the words of L'homme armé with the Kyrie, popular songs with the Communion service, must have come to regard the words as little better than inconvenient incumbrances.

* "The Fine Arts," p. 191.

At length a play was written by the poet Rinuccini on the classical subject of the story of Eurydice, and a musician who had been associated with these interesting meetings at the Bardi Palace, Peri, set this drama to music—not mere incidental music; the music was intended to follow the words throughout, and to add force to their meaning. Up to that moment, in all musical performances of a class higher than the popular ballad, the reverse had been the case, the words had rather been subsidiary to the music. If it pleased the musician to repeat his motives, the words perforce had to be repeated also; and this, as in all contrapuntal and fugal writing, many times over.

And when we remember that Palestrina, following a not uncommon practice of the day, had set to music the words "Here beginneth the first chapter of the Lamentations of the Prophet Jeremiah," we must admit that the time for a change had arrived. It was in thus studying the meaning of the words that musicians began to learn the lesson of drawing from models what they actually saw. Like Giotto, they began to look at the living sheep instead of at the traditional mosaic.

Such music as that of the golden age of Palestrina could only be used for the contemplative repetition of abstract thoughts, as of praise or of prayer, but could not possibly be suited to the rapid action of the drama. Thus, Peri's invention was really the invention of what we now know as recitative; but it was really something more than mere recitative. It was more akin to the dramatic declamation of the music of Wagner, but, of course, without the splendid orchestral effects which can be obtained at the present day.

It should be mentioned that this opera is, as I collect, the earliest example of the use of bars for the division of time, at least, in any large work. It is rather strange that this should be associated with musica parlante, where we do not expect to find the ready adoption of so rhythmic a device, the real origin of which must probably be looked for in dance music. I think that it tends to show that Peri and his associates had real practical work in hand, and no prejudices, and, therefore, the very practical division of music into bars was a device which found favour in their eyes.

The opera of "Eurydice" was performed in the year 1600, on the occasion of the marriage of Henry IV., of France, to Maria de Medici, and we may say, with Dr. Burney, that "the annals of modern music have hitherto furnished no event so important to the progress of art as the recovery" (and note this word, which is essentially the word renaissance) "or invention of recitative or dramatic melody." This Rinuccini himself says, in the dedication of the "Eurydice." His words are: "This noble manner of singing" (that of the ancients) "hath not been revived till now," and Cavaliere who, in the same year, 1600, wrote a sacred drama, or oratorio, speaks of the music as "that of the ancients recovered and revived." An interesting account of this oratorio will be found in Mr. Rockstro's "History of Music," which was published in 1886, and he draws attention to the close connection between the oratorio and opera. Again, Doni, writing a quarter of a century after Cavaliere and Rinuccini, says "We may soon hope to see this kind of music arrive at its ancient splendour." And Valle, writing again later, when the musical drama was fully established (in 1640), says—and his words are very curious—"the modern masters have learned how to use and respect good poetry, in setting which they relinquish all the pedantry of canons, fugues, and other Gothic inventions, and in imitation of the ancient Greeks, aspire at nothing but expression, grace, and propriety."

TEMPLE CHURCH.

On Thursday, June 21st, being the bi-centenary of the completion of the purchase of Father Smith's organ by the two honourable Societies of the Temple, Dr. Hopkins, the organist, played the following selection of music:—

Organ Concerto No. 2 (movements)...	Handel.
Largo (1st Pianoforte Concerto)	Beethoven.
Allegretto, "Lobgesang"	Mendelssohn.
Air, "With verdure clad"	Haydn.
Air, "Holsworthy Church Bells"......	S. S. Wesley.
Overture for Organ	T. Adams.
Fugue in E flat	Bach.
Variations on "O Sanctissima"	E. T. Chipp.
Terzetto	H. Smart.
Voluntary in D minor	J. Stanley.
Adagio Cantabile	E. J. Hopkins.
Festal March	H. Smart.

The selection, including pieces by celebrated English organists, was rendered with characteristic skill and taste. The vocal numbers were sung by the Temple boys. Dr. Hopkins named the different stops and effects used in his analytical programme. He also contributed the following account of the Temple organ:—

"The oldest inventory of 'Church Goods' in existence, so far as is known, is that which was taken of the property in the Temple Church, London, at the time of the general suppression of the Order of Knight Templars, in 1307. Its title ran thus: 'Goods and Ornaments in the Temple Church, London. Account of Nicholas Pygott, one of the Sheriffs of London, and Nigel Drury, the last sheriff, taken the Xth of January, 1st Edward IInd.' Among the 'Items' included in that document are found, 'In the Great Church, two pairs of organs'; also, 'In the Choir, one book for the Organs.' This very early and hitherto quite unnoticed reference to 'pairs of organs,'[*] is not only extremely interesting from an historical point of view, but is especially so as being a record of the predilection entertained by the Knight Templars of old for the instrument, a taste which was shown to have been inherited to a large extent by their successors exactly two centuries ago to-day, when, after a protracted trial of two organs made and erected in their church by the two most celebrated organ-builders of the time—Bernhard Smith and Renatus Harris—they finally selected that by the former builder, as 'containing the greatest number of rarities and excellencies.'

"The following are, briefly stated, the circumstances which led to two organs being submitted to the Societies from which to make choice:—'In September, 1682, the two hon. treasurers gave Father Smith some sort of verbal directions to make an organ for their church. But Renatus Harris, who resided in the neighbourhood—in 'Wyne Office Court, Fleet Street'—made interest with the Societies, who, in February, 1683 (according to the modern mode of calculation), proposed that 'If each of these excellent artists would set up an organ, the Societies would retain that which, in the greatest number of excellencies, deserved the preference.' Smith, thinking that he had already been selected to build the organ, obtained and presented a 'Memorandum' signed by five of the tradesmen employed by the Temple, which set forth that 'W^{m} Cleare, Surveyor, together with divers other workmenn, did hear S^{r} Francis Whitens, Knt, and then Treasurer of the Middel Tempell, London, and Sir Thomas Robinson, then also Treasurer of the Inner Temple, both of them being in the Tempell Church together in the month of Septemb^{r} last, (1682,) give full ordre and directions vnto M^{r} Bernard Smith, the Kings

[*] Chaucer, (died 1400)—who, it may be noted, entered his name at the Temple as a Law student—thus wrote, some 80 years later, in The Cock and the Fox:—

'His vois was merier than the mery Orgon
On mass daies, that in the churches gon.'

And in speaking of St. Cecilia, the same poet says:—

'And while that organs maden melodie,
To God alone thus in her heart sang she.'

Organ Maker, to make an organ for the Tempell Church, and then also gave ordres to the said Smith to take care of and give directions for the setting up of the Organ Loft in the Tempell Church as the said Smith should judg most convenient, and accordingly the said Smith did give directions how and in what manner the said Organ Loft should be made, and the same was made and set vpp accordingly.' The order of the previous February was not, however, rescinded; but a committee was appointed, composed of Masters of the Benches of the Two Societies, in May, 1683; and in about a twelvemonth, on the 26th of May, 1684, Harris presented a petition to the Benchers of the Inner Temple, stating that his organ was ready for trial, and praying that he might be permitted to set it up in the church on the south side of the Communion Table, which was allowed to be done. Smith's organ was doubtless standing in the recently-constructed west end gallery.

"Dr. Blow and Henry Purcell, whose compositions are still frequently heard and appreciated in the Temple Church, performed on Father Smith's organ and displayed its excellence on appointed days; and until the other was heard everyone believed that this must be chosen. Harris employed M. Baptiste Draghi, organist to Queen Catherine, at Somerset House, to touch his organ, which brought it into favour; and thus the two rival organ-builders continued vieing with each other for near a twelvemonth.

"At length, Harris challenged Father Smith to make additional reed-stops within a given time. There were the vox-humana, cremorne, and double bassoon, and some others, which were new to English ears, and gave great delight to the crowds who attended the trials. During the contention a lack of forbearance and lovingkindness was certainly manifested, for in the night preceding the last trial of the reed-stops the friends of Harris cut the bellows of Smith's organ in such a manner that, when the time came for playing upon it, no wind could be conveyed into the wind-chest. The contest continued until about the end of 1687 or the beginning of 1688, by which time the two competitors, to use the quaint language of the Hon. Roger North, 'were but just not ruined.'

THE SIR JOHN STAINER DINNER.

This interesting event will be an almost unique expression of regard and kindly appreciation, won by the eminent musician in whose honour the celebration is given, as a man and as an artist. As readers will remember, the dinner takes place under the presidency of Lord Herschell, on Tuesday next, the 17th, at the Hotel Métropole, at 7.30. Friends anxious to be present who are not yet provided with tickets, should apply at the College of Organists, or at 1, Berners Street, at once. The tickets are 25s. each. As a matter of current musical history, and as evidence of wide-spread sympathy, in which the great institutions, the Royal College of Music, the Royal Academy of Music, the College of Organists, and the Guildhall School of Music, are strongly represented, the following completed list of the committee is appended:—The Duke of Abercorn, Right Hon. A. J. Balfour, M.P., J. Barnby, J. F. Barnett, W. A. Barrett, Mus. Bac., J. C. Bridge, M.A., Mus. Doc., J. F. Bridge, Mus. Doc., Right Hon. Lord Charles Bruce, Earl Cadogan, A. Chappell, T. Chappell, Right Hon. Lord Coleridge, A. Coleridge, Col. the Hon. W. J. Colville, J. M. Crament, Mus. Bac., W. H. Cummings, Vice-Admiral C. T. Curme, W. G. Cusins, Rev. Canon Duckworth, Right Hon. THE DIRECTORSHIP OF CATHEDRAL MUSIC.

To the Editor of THE ORGAN WORLD.

Sir,—From the letter of "A Cathedral Organist" in THE ORGAN WORLD for June 30th, it would seem that I have not stated what I desired to say on the subject of "The Directorship of the Music in Cathedrals," &c., with the clearness I had hoped to have done. With your kind permission, therefore, I will now endeavour to put the matter more explicitly.

In olden time, and according to the ancient Statutes, the Precentor was the supreme director of the music, to whose opinion, guided as it was by superior knowledge, all the members of the musical staff were expected to, and doubtless under such circumstances did, submit. His competency to exercise that directorship was therefore secured; and at the time that the Statutes were framed it was a reality. As the Statutes were originally drawn up, so they now remain; and it is beyond doubt, therefore, that if the knowledge of precentors could be so enormously raised that they could once again come to the front by merit—not by Statute—no valid case could be made out for the suspension of that officer, and the greater recognition of the accomplished organist in his stead. That is the point I appear to have failed to make clear in my previous letter.

But is it probable that so great a reform can be effected? I agree with "A Cathedral Organist" in thinking not.

The musical staff of a cathedral, parish church or college chapel, consists of the organist, the lay clerks, the choristers, and over them all, the precentor. But, save by statute, where does the latter usually stand among that number for comparative musical knowledge? Among the present race of precentors, how many are there whose knowledge of the use of the organ approaches that of the organist; or who is as intimately acquainted with the alto and tenor cleffs as the lay clerks, or whose power of reading new music at first sight is equal to that of the leading choir boys, or who can compose twenty bars of decent modern "prick song," or who can even analyse such a piece in an intelligent manner to the organist or choir? With a "chief musician" exhibiting such short-comings, "continual friction" of course results. An example of a duly qualified precentor is found at Hereford, where the appointment is held by the gentleman who also worthily occupies the chair of the Professor of Music in the University of Oxford. That esteemed gentleman, in years gone by, went through the fag and toil of qualifying himself for such a post, and he is, therefore, able to appreciate the requirements of his talented organist; hence we hear nothing about "friction" at Hereford. Indeed it would almost seem that, in many instances, the extent of the precentor's knowledge and acquirements for that office may be accurately gauged by the amount of kindness and consideration he exhibits towards his organist, and vice versa.

At the sister university of Cambridge, a gentleman fills the chair of Professor of Music, whose qualifications are fully on a par with those which were exhibited by the Precentor of Hereford, at the same age, according to report; and whose fame is recognised not only throughout Great Britain, but also all over Germany. That gentleman's love for the organ, and interest for English Church Music, induces him to retain his appointment as "Organist of Trinity," in which college, however, there still exists, "ancient Statutes," and someone with "inscrutable ways," who, moreover, urges them. It would, perhaps, be inquisitive to inquire whether that person, after the manner of the old lady in the old legend, was some hundreds of years ago sent off into a deep sleep in one of the little mysterious college rooms up a dark staircase, from which slumber he has only just awakened, and much wishes that music should be as it was when he dozed off! But it is a question well worthy of consideration whether this matter of relying upon the authority given by out-of-date statutes is not running a risk of passing from the solemnly pompous stage into the slightly ridiculous.—Faithfully yours. J. K.

RECITAL NEWS.

St. Agnes, Cornwall.—Organ Recital given by Mr. W. John Reynolds, Mus. Bac. London, in the Wesleyan Chapel:—"Heaven and Earth Display" (Athalie), Mendelssohn; Invocation in B flat, Guilmant; Prelude and Fugue in C minor, Bach; Grand March in E flat minor, Schubert; a Jubilant March, Stainer: "The Lost Chord," Sullivan: Triumphal March (Naaman), Costa. The choir sang two anthems, "Ye shall dwell in the land," by Sir John Stainer, and "O Lord how manifold are Thy works." by Barnby.

Glasgow.—Organ recitals have been given lately by Mr. J. E. R. Senior, Mus. Bac., F.C.O., on the grand organ built by J. W. Walker and Sons, London. The following is a specimen programme:—Pastorale in F, Kullak; Romanza in E flat, Haydn; Fugue, D minor, Bach; "The Holy Night at Bethlehem," Lassen; Andante, E flat, Weber; Festal March, Elvey.

St. Andrew Undershaft.—On Thursday evening, June 28th, a special Jubilee Coronation festival service, consisting of sacred. vocal, organ, and orchestral music, was given by the Choir of St. Andrew and the Church Orchestral Society. Organist, Mr. W. J. Winter, assistant organist to Dr. J. F. Bridge at the Abbey; conductor, Mr. W. M. Wait, organist and choirmaster of St. Andrew Undershaft. There was a well-filled church, and the offertory was in aid of recent improvements made in the organ.

Dulwich College.—At a special afternoon service on July 1st, the following selection of music was played by Mr. W. H. Stocks. the organist of the chapel, assisted by Mr. A. Dolmetsch, Mr. F. Winterbottom, and the members of the Dulwich String Orchestra. Concerto in B flat (No. 2) for organ and orchestra (Handel); A tempo ordinario, Allegro, Adagio, Allegro ma non presto; Adagio for violoncello and organ (Bargiel); Fugue in E flat for organ solo (Bach); "The Seven Last Words of our Saviour," for orchestration (Haydn); introduction, sonata I; "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," for violin and organ (Gounod); Fugue for orchestra and organ, from the first grand concerto (Corelli).

Leamington College.—Organ recitals were given in the College Hall and Chapel on June 29th and July 1st inst., when the following pieces were played by the organist and choirmaster, O. O. Brooksbank, F.C O. Friday, June 29th, 1888: Introduction und Doppelfuge (Merkel); Allegretto (Lemmens); Gavotte (Bach); March (Handel); Andante con moto (Guilmant); Serenade (Helle); Festal March (Elvey). Sunday evening, July 1st: March in "Eli" (Costa); Andante with variations (Haydn).

Balham, S.W.—Programme of recital given by Mr. H. W. Weston, F.C.O., at the Parish Church, on July 1st (Dedication Festival):—Alla Marcia in E flat (Meyerbeer); Ave Maria (Ad. Henselt); Larghetto in G, from 2nd Symphony (Haydn); Pastoral Introduction to Joan d'Arc (C. Gounod); Overture, "Ruy Blas" (Mendelssohn).

Parish Church, Wandsworth.—At the dedication of the new organ, on the 23rd June, a recital was given by Mr. Henry W. Weston, F.C.O. The programme included Grand Organ Concerto in D minor and major (Handel); Allegretto in B minor (Alex. Guilmant); Tempo di Minuetto in F major (H. W. Weston); Pastoral Introduction in G major (C. Gounod); Introduction, Theme, Variations, and Finale in A A. Hesse).

St. Barnabas (Kentish Town).—On Saturday, June 30th, the programme was as follows:—Festive March in D (H. Smart); Allegretto Pastorale (C. Warwick Jordan); Grand Chœur in A (Salomé); Song, "With verdure clad" (Haydn); Grand Prelude and Fugue in A minor (Bach); Pastorale (Kullak); Processional March (H. Easun); Song; Communion in E flat (Batiste); Fantasia alla Marcia (Bennett). Mr. Henry Easun (organist St. Thomas's Square Chapel, Hackney) was the organist. Vocalist—Miss Bush.

St. Barnabas, Homerton.—A service of sacred music was excellently given by a local Choral Society, on July 4th. The soloists were: Miss Florence Monk, Miss Eva M. Edell, Mr. B. T. Bartrum, M.A. The music was as follows:— "Overture in C" (Merkel); "Ave verum" (Mozart), Mr. B. T. Bartrum; "Angels ever bright and fair," "Theodora" (Handel), Miss Edell; "Gloria," from 12th Mass (Mozart); "Children, pray this love to cherish" (Spohr), Miss Edell and Mr. Bartrum; and Hiller's "Song of Victory," Miss F. Monk singing the solos with artistic effect. Conductor, Mr. Edwin Farthing; organist, Mr. Harold B. Osmond, A.C.O.

Lycett Memorial Wesleyan Chapel, Mile End Road, E.—The programme of an organ recital recently given by Mr. W. John Reynolds, B.Mus. (London), in connection with the erection of an organ (built by Gray and Davison; rebuilt by Kirkland), included:—Fugue in E flat (St. Ann), Bach; Movement in B flat (from the "Cambridge Installation Ode"), Sterndale Bennett; Andante Cantabile, Th. Salome; War March of the Priests ("Athalie"), Mendelssohn; Elevation in A flat, Guilmant; Offertoire in F major, Wely; and Grand March in B minor, Schubert.

On the 27th ult., Mr. E. H. Lemare gave a recital after an evening festival service held at St. John's, Brownswood Park, N. The programme included:—Air with variations and Cantilene Pastorale, Guilmant; Fantasia on a German hymn, Lemare; Chorus of Angels, Scotson Clark; Finale, Lemmens; and the Bridal Music "Lohengrin," Wagner.

The fourth annual choir festival of the parish churches of the Ards district, diocese of Down, Ireland, was held on the 14th ult., in Poriaferry Church, when ten parochial choirs, representing 170 voices, were present. The Rev. W. F. Hogan, rector of All Saints', Eglantine, presided at the organ.

Notes.

The following old story is going the round of the musical papers, it seems:—While hunting in the neighbourhood of Gotha in the year 1843, the first Emperor of Germany, then Prince William, visited the organ factory at Paulinzelle. After explaining the construction of an organ, the proprietor seated himself to play a piece for the guest, whom he did not know. Finding the Prince an attentive auditor, he asked if he could perform upon the instrument. "A little," he answered, taking his place, soon surprising the organ-builder with his selections, ending with the popular melody, "Heil Dir im Sieger-Kranz." "Excellent!" cried the organ-maker at its finish; "your talent is great. I can recommend you to a position as organist!" "That," answered the Prince, you must give to one more worthy, since I already have a position which I cannot well resign." "May I ask with whom I have the honour of speaking?" continued the manufacturer. "I am William, Prince of Prussia." "Ah! your Royal Highness, what a pity! The profession loses a talented performer." "Yes, my dear master," added the Prince, giving his hand in farewell, "but God divides talent and position according to His wisdom, and perhaps I shall yet make something out of my own profession."

Colonel Paley, of Cantley Hall, Doncaster, has generously offered to present Canon Fleming with an organ for the new Church of St. Philip, Buckingham Palace Road, at a cost of eleven hundred pounds.

The Mass and Te Deum which Gounod directed at Rheims the other Sunday will be given in the autumn at the Church of St. Eustache in Paris. Upon this occasion there will be a chorus of at least five hundred voices, and the Te Deum will be accompanied by twenty harps.

On a recent Sunday morning Herr Meyer Lutz, who has rendered long and distinguished services in his capacity as organist (for 40 years) to St. George's Catholic Cathedral, Southwark, was the recipient of a pleasant surprise in the shape of a testimonial and a silver-mounted bâton, the gift of the choir boys. The little fellows had kept their secret well, and when a youth of some nine summers stepped forward, after the service had concluded, to read the testimonial, the composer and conductor thought that the boy had come to have his voice tried. It was a happy thought on the part of the boys to offer to Herr Meyer Lutz some small mark of the respect and esteem in which they held him. In a few words Herr Meyer Lutz thanked the choristers for the kindly feeling which had prompted them to make the presentation, and assured them of the interest he took in their welfare.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS' CALENDAR.

HEARING ON PAPER.

Most young musicians aspiring to become composers experience a rude shock to their ardour when confronted at the very outset of their studies with what, in some cases, proves to be a life-long obstacle to the free and satisfactory exercise of whatever powers of musical productiveness they may happen to possess; that difficulty arising from the absolute necessity of so educating the eye that it shall in time be able to act as a sort of intermediary between the organ of hearing and the musical sounds which form the subject matter of their art. "Hearing on paper" is manifestly quite an artificial process. With some individuals its acquirement seems next door to an impossibility, while in few cases has the power been arrived at without much assiduous practice and hard work. Even when the mind has become fairly habituated to the association of written signs with their corresponding sounds, the battle is found to have been only half won after all. If the mental impression, as often happens, is not sufficiently vivid; if the sounds thus raised are but the ghost of sounds, thin and colourless, the attempted composition is sure to be colourless too. One way of evading the trouble will, as a matter of course, occur to every beginner. "Why not," he is almost sure to ask, "endeavour to realise immediately any musical thought that occurs by playing it first upon some keyed instrument such as the piano, and then when all is clear commit it to paper?" A plausible notion, but nevertheless, with some exceptions, to which we shall presently advert, a delusion. Extempore playing and sustained serious compositions, though one may often serve as a stimulus and help to the other, are widely different things, and these are good reasons why a judicious teacher will urge upon his pupil the desirableness of endeavouring from the first to think and express his thoughts without having recourse to the piano. Free scope of this imagination is sure otherwise to be impeded by one of two causes, either, that is, by the limited nature of the musical effects properly belonging to the instrument itself, or, secondly, by difficulties of a purely technical and mechanical kind. Rare, indeed, are the cases where the composer is also a virtuoso gifted with so consummate a mastery over the resources of his instrument that brain and fingers are in complete accord, so that ideas passing through the one become instantaneously transmitted and rendered by the other. In proportion as this is not the case will the fancy, cramped and hampered by executive exigencies, be apt to run in grooves and to depend upon such passages as unconsciously acquired habit have made specially familiar and easy to the player. The ideal composer, then, is one who is able to realise the whole domain of sound without extraneous aid, who plays upon the ruled staff on musical paper precisely as a performer plays upon his instrument; to whose mind's ear, in short, every dot he sets down not so much represents as is a vivid, clearly defined sound. Similarly, when writing for the orchestra, the timbre and individual peculiarity of every separate instrument, as well as the general effect of every combination, will for him possess a distinct objective reality.

All this, no doubt is presupposing a very high degree of musical culture; and the number of those who thus enjoy perfect command over the course, arrangement, and development of their ideas may be said to be just the number of composers belonging to the very foremost rank. How, then, is this happy independence to be acquired, or even approximated, in the case of ordinary mortals? Young composers may be recommended that in the course of countrapuntal study, laid down by past masters of the science—a study which, as a means of preliminary discipline, will never, it may be safely said, become obsolete, whatever relaxation of its rules may be tolerated in the modern freer style—they have ready to hand exercises for familiarising both eye and ear, first with the simplest combinations, and in due time, by progressive steps, with the most complex. By means of these exercises they will be enabled to attain, within the limits of their natural endowments, the desired mastery over what may be called the composer's stock-in-trade, provided always they resolutely eschew the aid of the piano while writing. The question is worth considering by teachers, how long it is desirable to limit their pupils' work to the artificial restrictions of the diatonic style. For there is always a fear that, after learning to shudder at the infringement of rules, which, in a later stage are to be no rules, the ear may be permanently mistrained to the slavish observance of a narrow and obsolete code. In what has been said there is, of course, no desire to underrate the value of the piano at certain moments and under certain conditions, both to students and to ripe composers. The ways of the latter, when at work, seem to differ in one respect. From all we can learn, it may be presumed that Mozart heard music first in the mind, and then committed it to paper. Beethoven, on the other hand, judging from the number of rough notes he used to jot down at odd intervals—as evidenced for example in the well-known elaborate "Sketches," edited by Nottebohm—may be called a composer of musico-literary habit, accustomed to think on paper. In the case of both, as indeed of most great composers, the piano was their cherished companion, and the source of some of their happiest inspirations; but the breadth of effect and freedom of treatment by which their productions were distinguished were the result of work done independently of the piano, and could never have been achieved had they not also possessed, in a pre-eminent degree, the faculty of "hearing on paper."

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Two at least amongst the operatic performances of the past week call for more than passing notice. In a season that has by no means been lacking in features of considerable and even permanent interest, the presentations of Rossini's "Guglielmo Tell" and "Carmen," are likely to be conspicuously remembered. Comparative mythologists may discover, if they choose, that there was no such hero as William Tell, and that the stirring tales which enshrine his memory are purely fictitious. The musical public cares for none of these things. It is a favourite paradox of Mr. Ruskin's, that an artist should not be an antiquarian, and that it suffices, for the purpose of his art, that he shall have understood the spirit of the time with which he deals, and that his representation be faithful to that spirit, although his external details may be full of anachronisms. Similarly it matters little that the object of a national enthusiasm may never have existed outside the historian's brain; a tale of patriotism, of chivalric unselfishness, is not a whit the less powerful that it is fictitious. "Let them rave," says the musician of the philosopher who wrangles round the empty grave, and he cares as much as ever for the dramatic numbers of Rossini's opera. Well rendered as that opera has been, in times past, the performance last week was equal, if not superior, to the best of its predecessors. The reasons for this are obvious. Both in libretto and music, the most interesting parts fall to the lot of the male singers, and it is in these that Mr. Harris's company is strongest. Again, Rossini has dealt well with the chorus, giving it some magnificent opportunities, as indeed was inevitable from the nature of the whole story; and Mr. Harris's chorus is certainly admirable. Its members not only look well, and sing better, but they one and all take intelligent interest in the works they perform, and become essential parts of the picture. It might therefore have been anticipated that the performance in question would be as good as it proved to be. M. Prevost, M. Edouard de Reszke, and M. Lassalle, who were entrusted with the leading parts, were especially admirable. Seldom has the part of Tell been played with more dramatic intensity, or sung with greater artistic skill, than it was by M. Lassalle. Almost identical praise is deserved by M. Edouard de Reszke, who gave an equally forcible reading of the part of Walter, while these two artists, in conjunction with M. Prevost, gave a striking rendering of the trio, "La gloria infiamme." Miss Macintyre was the Mathilde of the evening, and although the part was by no means so well adapted to her as some of those in which she has previously appeared, she was, on the whole, fairly successful, giving the air "Selva opaca" in a very effective way. The parts of Melcthal and Edwiga were taken by Signor Novara and Mdlle. Lablache respectively, in a sufficiently satisfactory way, and the performance of the orchestra, under Signor Mancinelli, was excellent.

We have spoken of Saturday's performance of "Carmen" also as one of considerable interest. "Carmen" is always attractive, by reason of its intrinsic beauty, but on the occasion of which we speak additional interest attached, as a young American Singer, Mdlle Zelie de Lussan by name, was announced to appear in the chief part. Favourable accounts had reached England of the lady's ability, but so suspicious is a musical critic of new prime donne whose advent is heralded by preliminary advertisements, that few were prepared for the pleasant surprise which awaited those who witnessed Mdlle. de Lussan's début. Not the least pleasant part of that surprise was the striking likeness which exists between the débutante and Mdme. Patti, and which apparently so astonished the audience at first that most people forgot to listen, and simply looked. The likeness is, indeed, remarkable and suggested some kind of relationship, which does not, however, exist. Mdlle. de Lussan is, like the great prima donna, the product of mingled types, being the American-bred daughter of a French father and a Spanish mother. Perhaps to this mixture of races is due also the strong individuality which the young lady brings to bear on the interpretation of such a part as Carmen. She is much more than the pretty and passionate Southern represented by most of the many artists who have essayed the part. Mdlle. de Lussan's conception is altogether a more powerful and dominating one than usual. She is seductive and graceful, but there is added a touch of diablerie and imperiousness, which make her a more than commonly striking Carmen. Beyond these qualities as an actress, Mdlle. de Lussan is a vocalist of no mean order. Her voice is a sympathetic mezzo-soprano of agreeable quality and fairly good compass, although it is at present scarcely powerful enough to fill so vast a theatre as Covent Garden. Altogether, Mr. Harris is to be congratulated on his latest acquisition, who will not be forgotten as a mere bird of passage, but to whose reappearance amateurs will look forward with considerable interest.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The performance, yesterday, by the students of the Royal College, of Nicolai's opera, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," could hardly have come at a more opportune moment than this, when the musical world is agitating itself concerning the need for operatic training colleges in England. The College of Music has been pre-eminent in the matter, having always afforded facilities for instruction to those of its pupils who gave evidence of operatic ability. The wisdom of this course has been shown by the performances which have from time to time been given, the last taking place, as we have said, on Wednesday. A more suitable work could hardly have been found, for though the character of Falstaff himself is one which demands more experience and strength of grasp than can be reasonably expected from novices, on the whole the work has that grace and lightness which are necessary to a performance of the kind. The principal parts were taken on the present occasion by singers who, one and all, gave distinct evidence of capacity, which, in many cases, is already developed to a marked degree. The young ladies who played the parts of Mrs. Ford, Mrs. Page, and Anne were Miss Annie Roberts, Miss Emily Squire, and Miss Maggie Davies respectively, and were very satisfactory; Miss Roberts especially singing with a great deal of feeling, while her acting in the scene with her jealous husband was the most promising and artistic thing in the whole performance. The principal male parts were taken by Mr. L. M. Kilby, who enacted the rôle of Fenton in a sufficiently pleasant way by Mr. W. C. Millward, Mr. A. C. Peach, Mr. Adams-Owen, and Mr. Daniel Price. Mr. Millward attacked the part of Falstaff with a degree of success, which augurs well for his future. Mr. Daniel Price, who has previously given distinct evidence of capacity both as singer and actor, gave a very forcible reading of the part of Mr. Ford, a remark which may also be applied to Mr. Adams-Owen as Page. Dr. C. V. Stanford conducted, and the orchestra deserve high credit for the accuracy and style of their performance, qualities which were especially noticeable in the overture. The ballet in the last act was danced by children trained by Madame Katti Lanner, and was a very charming performance. All this goes to prove with what admirable thoroughness Sir George Grove and his professors have set themselves to the task of instruction, and with what aptitude and industry the students of the Royal College have set themselves to learn.

Concerts.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

The last Richter Concert was given on Monday, when the strikingly interesting series was brought to a fitting termination by an admirable performance of Beethoven's great Mass in D. The vocal solo parts were taken by Miss Anna Williams, Miss Lena Little, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Henschel, who one and all did excellently, Mr. Lloyd especially being in fine voice. It is late in the day to speak in detail of the colossal work itself, and it need only be recorded that under Dr. Richter's guidance, the orchestra and chorus attacked their task with the greatest courage, and a fair share of success. Certainly the orchestra deserved the highest honour, playing throughout as only Dr. Richter's orchestra can. The chorus, though better than formerly, was still a little rough in places; but a perfect rendering of such a work could not be expected. It is to the credit of all the performers that they attempted so bravely, and achieved so much. At the close of the concert, Dr. Richter was recalled again and again by the crowded and rightly enthusiastic audience.

MR. WILHELM GANZ.

The handsome drawing-rooms of Dudley House, whose owners have always figured so honourably as discriminating and generous patrons in the world of art, were the scene, last week, of Mr. Wilhelm Ganz's annual concert, when a number of distinguished artists and amateurs came together to do honour to the accomplished concert-giver, the first-named by their performances, and the second by their presence and applause. A concert less interesting could hardly, in the face of such weather as prevailed have drawn together such an audience as actually assembled, although to the attractions of Mr. Ganz's own performances was added the prospect of hearing such artists as Mdme. Nordica, Mdme. Patey, Miss Georgina Ganz, Signor Runcio, and Mr. Herbert Thorndike, with Herr Waldemar Meyer and Signor Bottesini to give soli, the one on the violin, the other on the contra bass. To give Mr. Ganz the position to which he is entitled, let us mention that he played Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, with a quintet accompaniment, in a singularly artistic way, that he joined Herr Meyer in the "Andante con Variazione" from Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata, and MM. Meyer, Grossheim, Libotton, and Bottesini in Hummel's Quintet in E flat minor, op. 87. Mdme. Patey sang Schubert's "Who is Sylvia?" in her finest style and Mdme. Nordica's sweet voice was heard in Delibe's "Chanson Espagnole," "Nous venions de voir le taureau," of which she gave a magnificent rendering; Miss Ganz the "Deh Vieni" from "Figaro," the "Invocation" from Gounod's "Polyeucte," and Kjeruf's "Last Night," in all of which her cultured style and genuine artistic feeling were excellently shown. The remainder of the artists concerned did not less well, and all shared in the honours of a most interesting afternoon.

LADY FOLKESTONE'S CONCERT.

Were it only on account of its object, the concert given by the Viscountess Folkestone at St. James's Hall, on Thursday evening, in aid of the fund for distressed Irish ladies is deserving of brief notice. The stringed orchestra conducted by that lady has done much good work in the cause of charity, and we had occasion some time ago to mention a performance given at the People's Palace, and listened to by an audience which, no doubt, felt the refining influence of art practised so zealously and purely for art's sake. We have more than once pointed out that in thus spreading a taste for better things among all classes, high and low, the true task of the amateurs in music must be discovered. Last night's performance tended to show that the young ladies, who play upon all manner of stringed instruments, from the bright violin to the grave double bass, under the Viscountess Folkestone's able and zealous direction, look upon their duty in a serious light, and we are able to bear witness to considerable improvement in the matter of intonation and of attack since we last heard this orchestra. Neither should the chorus be forgotten, which contains some fresh and agreeable voices and sings in both tune and time. Among specially successful efforts we may mention the accompaniment by the band of Handel's organ concerto No. 2 in B flat, the solo part of which was performed in a masterly manner by Dr. Bridge, organist of Westminster Abbey; also Wagner's "Feuillet d'Album" for piano, arranged for strings and phrased with remarkable neatness on this occasion. The soloists who took part in the concert materially contributed to the enjoyment of the very large and distinguished audience which filled St. James's Hall almost to the last seat. Mr. Henschel sang Schumann's "Die beiden Grenadiere," winding up with the inspiriting strains of the "Marseillaise," with his accustomed vigour. Mdlle. Karin Lindstén gave two Swedish folksongs as one to the manner born, and Herr Robert Kaufmann, the German tenor, produced his voice in a more satisfactory manner than some German tenors are wont to do. But the most successful performance of the evening was Gounod's "Noël," in which the soprano solo was sung to perfection by Madame Valleria, the chorus and orchestra assisting in a manner well worthy of the artist with whom they were associated. Mdme. Valleria also gave Lady Folkestone's "The angel's garden," to the evident delight of the audience, which encored the song. The composer accompanied on the piano, and the harp obbligato part was tastefully played by Mr. John Thomas.—The Times.

MISCELLANEOUS.

M. Alfred Napoleon, the French pianist, gave a concert at Steinway Hall, last Friday afternoon. The programme included a Prelude and Fugue by Bach, the first movement of Beethoven's Sonata, op. 111, the Sonata Appassionata, four familiar pieces by Chopin, some original compositions, and Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet, in which the strings were in the hands of MM. Sons, J. Koopman, Starr, and Maurice Koopman. M. Sons (violinist), also was heard in Vieuxtemps's somewhat hackneyed Ballade and Polonaise. M. Napoleon is a finished pianist, and in the Bach and Beethoven numbers he was heard to considerable advantage; but he is by no means an ideal Chopin player, being at once too showy and too formal in both execution and expression. His own compositions are not of any special interest, though they are neatly and unaffectedly written. Like most pianists of the French school, M. Napoleon proved, in the quintet, that he is an able leader. The concert was attended by an enthusiastic, though not numerous audience, in which the French element predominated.

Mr. Ralph Stuart, a very young pianist, though not a prodigy, made his first appeal to public sympathy at Princes' Hall, last Saturday afternoon, in a programme selected entirely from the works of Chopin. The young artist, who is still studying under Mr. Emil Bach, made a distinctly favourable impression, and when he has overcome the nervousness which, especially in the earlier numbers, prevented him from doing himself justice, he will undoubtedly be found to possess many valuable qualities. It is questionable whether the choice of Chopin's music exclusively was a wise one; for a composer requiring such subtle and intangible barriers between graceful freedom and grotesque exaggeration is hardly safe in the hands of extreme youth and inexperience; so, as might have been anticipated, some of the liberties taken with the time (e.g., the trio, in D flat, of the valse in A flat) were not happy in effect. But such little errors of judgment weigh little against the general intelligence of his readings and the correctness of his execution. A useful and successful career should follow his promising first appearance.

Mdlle. Bartkowska gave a concert at the Steinway Hall on Monday afternoon last, which was scarcely so well attended as it deserved to be. The lady herself has a voice of agreeable quality and good compass, which she used with considerable skill and taste. She elected to be heard in such familiar pieces as the great air from Der Freischutz, Bishop's "Tell me, my heart," and Gounod's Serenade, to which latter piece the obbligato was played by Mr. R. Blagrove on the concertina with great taste. Mdlle. Bartkowska also joined Mdme. Enriquez in a well-rendered performance of the duet from Boito's "Mefistofele," and in all of these achieved much success. A most interesting feature of the concert was the singing of Mdlle. Otta Brönnum, of whose concert last week we were enabled to speak so warmly. On the present occasion Mdlle. Brönnum sang in a way which amply justified the expectations then formed. She contributed most artistic and expressive renderings of Grieg's "Solveig's song," and Kjerulf's "Last night." Encored in these, she gave Sullivan's "My dearest heart," which served admirably to exhibit the best qualities of her voice, and in especial sang the English words with a clearness and intelligence which might well serve as example to many English artists. Mdlle. Bartkowska was also assisted by Mdme. Enriquez, Miss Edith Green, Mr. Albert, and Mr. Blagrove, who all won recognition for their efforts.

The Chevalier Palmieri's concert was given at the Marlborough Rooms, on Saturday last, when some novelties were performed. A violin solo, "Zegluner's Traum," by Samuelli, dedicated to, and played by, Signor Erba, was commonplace, but a MS. "Theme and variations," in D major, from the pen of, and played by, the concert-giver, was remarkably brilliant, tuneful, and effective, and was so well played that the Chevalier had to acknowledge a recall from a large and fashionable, but not very demonstrative audience. Another of his piano solos, a Scherzo in B minor, proved also above the average of such compositions. Signori Bonetti, De Monaco, and F. Runcio (the latter of whom sang "Deserto in terra," from Donizetti's "Don Sebastiano" excellently), and Mdlles. Delephine Le Brun, and Rosina Isidor (who were heard to great advantage in "Ouvre tes yeux bleus," by Massenet, and Maggi's "At Last" respectively) assisted. Especial mention must be made of the duet "Una Voce," admirably sung by Signor Bonetti, and Mdlle. Rosina Isidor, and of the artistic accompaniments of Signor Bisaccia.

Mr. Charles Wade's annual concert was given at Princes' Hall, on Tuesday last, before a large, but not crowded audience. It is hardly necessary to say that a most acceptable programme was offered, Mr. Wade, himself singing in his usual artistic and effective style Coleridge's "Farewell," A. Wellesley Batson's "The Heavenly Promise," Mendelssohn's "In the Piazzetta," and Blumenthal's "Evening Song," and joining Miss Hilda Wilson in M. V. White's "It is na Jean." Miss Wilson was also heard to advantage in "A Pine-tree standeth lonely," by Thouless, and Kjerulf's "Love Voices." Miss Bertha Moore's pretty voice was well suited with Hope Temple's "There are none like to thee," and she was also most successful in "My mother bids me bind my hair," and Harriet Young's "Lullaby." Mons. Hollman played with considerable ability and excellence of tone some 'cello solos, an Andante from his first concerto, and a Mazurka, also from his own pen, displaying his powers in an admirable manner. Mr. C. Hopkins Ould was the principal accompanist.

The concert given by the well-known pianist, Signor Carlo Ducci, at the residence of Mr. Mortlock, Sloane Street, presented unusually attractive features both in the selection of the artists and the pieces concerned, the latter presenting a happy mixture of the classical and ad captandum styles. Amongst the vocalists special effects were made by Mdlle. Jane Devigne's exquisite delivery, with rare distinctness of enunciation, of airs by Bemberg and Bizet, and by Mdme. Schluter's rendering of an effective song, "Beyond the shadows," by the concert-giver. Miss Louise Templer was duly piquant in Ingraham's "Courtship"; Miss Lillie P. Berg made a successful début with "To Sevilla," by the too-much-neglected song-writer, Dessaner; and Signor Pasini showed much feeling in "Lina," by San Fiorenzo. The instrumentalists included the great contrabasso virtuoso, Signor Bottesini, with three of his charmingly-written soli; the violoncellist, M. Hollman, with two of his elegant morceaux; Signor Gomez distinguished himself on the clarinet in Weber's beautiful adagio, and the beneficiaire who gave for his soli a brilliant execution of a "Tarantelle," by Gottschalk, and one of Brahms's masterly and too-seldom-heard "Capricci," besides exemplifying his excellent teaching in Mozart's "Duo" for two pianoforti tastefully performed by his youthful pupil, Maude Graves, and himself. Last, but not least, Mdlle. Thénard's highly-artistic recitation of two humorous sketches in French added greatly to the delight of a much-gratified audience.

Mdlle. Juliette Folville, the young Belgian artist, who has on several occasions exhibited her unusual gifts and attainments as an exquisite violinist, pianist, and composer, gave a farewell concert at Mrs. Huntington's, 40, Park Lane, under distinguished patronage, displaying a further musical accomplishment by a highly finished performance of Guilmant's "Invocation," and a scholarly piece of her own, on the organ, and distinguishing herself likewise in chamber-music by taking the violin part in Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Trio in D minor. The violin soli included the andante and finale from Mendelssohn's Concerto, and, on the piano, of Chopin's Sonata (1st movement) in B flat minor, besides her own "Rêverie," and "Mer Phosphorescente," transcribed from her very charming "Orchestral Suites." Mdlle. de Lido sung the bèneficiare's dainty "Berceuse" in finished style, M. Hollman delighted the audience with his own Romance and Mazurka on the violoncello, Mr. George Cox added some very taking songs by that talented amateur Miss Rosalind Ellicott, and Signor Carlo Ducci acquitted himself like a genuine artist at the piano in the trio, and as accompanist.

Mr. Harry Williams gave a concert at the Steinway Hall on Thursday afternoon, at which he amply proved the justness of his claims to be heard in London concert-rooms. He possesses a tenor voice, which, though not powerful, is of pleasant quality, and the songs in which he chose to be heard, including Mattei's "Stars love the night," served to show off the agreeable nature of his organ, and his method of using it, to the fullest extent. Beside the songs contributed, he took part in concerted pieces with Mdlle. Groll and others. To the interest of his own performances was added that of such well-known artists as Miss Annie Schuberth, Mdlle. Leila Dufour, Signor Carpi, and Miss Thérèse Castellan.

Mr. Bernhardt's concerts are intended primarily to introduce rising talent, and that of Tuesday last, at the Portman Rooms, was in its way successful. It would be impossible in our limited space to mention all that deserve to be mentioned, as no less than 23 ladies and gentlemen took part in the programme and won the applause of a large audience, some, of course, being more successful than others. For the gratification of those that like such painful exhibitions, a little girl aged five was put up to recite.

Signor Villa's concert took place on Monday afternoon, at Collard's Rooms, Grosvenor Street, when the concert giver had arranged a highly attractive programme, not the least interesting contributions being his own songs. The possessor of a pleasant baritone voice, well trained and used, he was heard to advantage in Rotoli's barcarolle, "St. Alba," Mattei's "Ode tu?" and, in conjunction with Miss Lena Law, in Rusuli's pretty duet, "Meeting." Amongst those who assisted were

Miss Annie Marriott, who gave fine interpretations of the cavatina from "Ernani," and a clever and graceful song by Miss Edith Marriott, "Away, away," the young composer also singing Schubert's "Who is Sylvia?" by Miss Lena Law. Miss Eugène Kemble, and Mr. Henry Phillips, who again made a distinct success, with a charming rendering of Miss Carmichael's "Milkmaid."

Mr. Edwin Holland's concert, which took place on Friday of last week, at the Portman Rooms, Baker Street, afforded the concert-giver an admirable opportunity of proving to the musical public the quality and scope of the work in which he has been engaged as a teacher of singing. A lengthy programme, which, in spite of its length, was of unflagging interest, contained a large number of names of singers, more or less well known, who, at different periods, have passed through Mr. Holland's hands; and who now came together to show, in the most practical of all ways, with what degree of success Mr. Holland had trained them. The names of seventeen performers appeared on the programme, and against no less than eleven of these was placed the asterisk, signifying that the bearer of the name was a pupil of the concert-giver; and amongst them were to be found such names as those of Miss Greta Williams, Miss Isabelle Pirardot, Miss Emilie Harris, Mr. Charles Banks, Mr. Herbert Clinch, Mr. Alec Marsh, Mr. Clifford, and Mr. Watkin Mills. A professor could hardly wish for better witnesses to the worth of his system of musical training than this, and Mr. Edwin Holland was, no doubt, a proud man. To mention all the separate performances worthy of mention would be impossible, but we may single out the performances of Mr. Watkin Mills, Mr. Clinch, and Mr. Marsh as especially good. Mr. Mills gave a fine rendering of Mr. Hamish MacCann's new song, "Pour Forth the Wine," Mr. Clinch gave a very delicate interpretation of Leslie's "Annabel Lee," and Mr. Marsh sang with his wonted vigour, Tosti's "Beauty's Eyes." Besides these, other artists of more or less note sang and played, among them being Madame Belle Cole, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Frederic King, and Mr. Septimus Webbe. Of these the famous American contralto, who has already accomplished so much in England, but has seldom sung better than on Friday, gave charming interpretations of Schira's "Sognai," and a very clever and interesting song by Capt. H. W. Thatcher, "The Dream King." Miss Eleanor Rees's rich voice and sympathetic style were exhibited admirably in "I've been roaming," and Mr. King sang with much spirit Faure's hymn, "Les Rameaux."

On Wednesday last the second of a series of miscellaneous concerts, under the direction of Signor Ducci, was given at the Italian Exhibition. The vocalists for the occasion were Signorina Ponti, Signor Pasini, and Signor Abramoff, who were heard in various favourite Italian songs and operatic excerpts. Signor Bottesini again asserted his mastery over the difficulties of his unwieldy instrument; Signor Papini played some violin solos in a very sympathetic style; and Signor Ducci, besides his efficient services as accompanist, contributed Gottschalk's celebrated "Tarantelli" for the pianoforte. The entertainment was entirely successful, and, despite the multifarious other attractions, drew a large audience to the concert hall.

Not the least interesting of the past week's concerts was the matinée musicale given by Miss Edwards, at 100, Ebury Street, on Tuesday last, which drew together a large and fashionable audience. Miss Edwards gave proof of her versatile talents by vocal and instrumental performances of considerable merit, amongst the former being a charming rendering of Gounod's "Ave Maria," the violin obbligato to which was played by Signor Papini. Mdlle. Otta Brönnum sang Danish airs in her own delightfully piquant manner, and made a further advance towards that popularity with English amateurs which she will undoubtedly achieve. Able assistance was also given by Mr. Bovett, Mr. Frederic Penna, Signor Tito Mattei, and Herr Lehmeyer.

Having put down at my works two engines and machinery of the most desirable kind, I am now supplying my goods at a price which enables every organist and organ student to have always ready for use in his Studio an

ORGAN PEDAL PIANO,

Affording Perfectly Unique Pedal Practice.

34, Sheen Park, Richmond.

Dear Sir,—I have deferred writing to comment upon your Pedals and Action now attached to my pianoforte until I could satisfy myself of their utility and efficiency. I can now conscientiously say that they more than fulfil all my anticipations. Although I am no carpenter, aided by your lucid diagram I had little difficulty in attaching them myself, and it is impossible to over-estimate the comfort they give to me or to conceive the saving of time one experiences in one's own room.—Believe me, yours truly,

BURNHAM HORNER, F.R. Hist.S.

To Mr. Mr. Ainsworth.

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to bear testimony to the perfection of your Invention. I am more than satisfied with your Patent Action and Organ Pedals, and consider them worth double the money. Organists and organ students who desire to improve in the Art of Pedalling, which is so essential to a good organist, will do well to procure a set. I have seen no Action half so effective, and one can sit at the Piano and play, "Fixed in his everlasting seat," or any other organ music, or organ arrangement with the greatest pleasure. The touch of pedals could not be better, and the action is as you say, "Absolutely free from annoyances." They cannot be too highly recommended, as by their use, rapid progress is certain.—Believe me, sincerely yours,

I. B. Thornton,
Organist, Birstall, Leeds.

Cologne, July 16th, 1886.

My Dear Sir,—I have much pleasure in informing you that your Pedals have given the fullest satisfaction. I have them combined with my practice Piano. Many of my musical friends who have seen them, as well as my organ pupils, are quite delighted with them; and I must acknowledge that I have never met with any Pedals so noiseless and pleasant to play upon as yours. The Action I consider durable, and of very good workmanship. Every organist who desires to perfect his playing will welcome your invention. I can recommend your goods in every respect.—Yours truly,

Herr J. RODENKIRCHEN.

Facts and Comments.

The minstrel boy, et hoc genus omne, is gone, not to the war, but for his holiday. For a season London will be, from the musical point of view, as deserted and silent as overthrown Babylon. The sound of harpers harping on their harps—twenty-two—will be heard no more, and the noise of the sackbut and psaltery is hushed; and the thoughts of the musical critic, as he watches the last minstrel disappear, lie too deep for tears, and even for what ladies, with a refinement of irony, are wont to call "language." He has had a long and weary season, and has not been allowed, like the rude people of whom the ballad tells, to sleep while the troubadour has touched his guitar, more or less gaily; and now visions fleet through his heated brain of some quiet country-house, with a "muslin-clad Mabel or May" to "dash him with eau-de-Cologne;" or if he is more seriously inclined, he turns to his favourite poets, lying dusty on the bookshelves. Soothed by their dulcet strains, he forgets his cares; and by diligently avoiding all poems which seem to deal with music, he may for a short time be a comparatively happy man.

The poets have written a good deal about music, although their ideas on the subject are usually vague; but it may surprise literary students to be told that Mr. Swinburne has excelled all his brethren in the skill with which he has depicted the feelings of a critic at the end of a musical season. Should the more seriously-minded person whose existence we have imagined take up one of Mr. Swinburne's early volumes and turn to that most musically melancholy poem, "The Triumph of Time," he will find this verse:—

> I shall never be friends again with roses:
>   I shall loathe sweet tunes, where a note grown strong
> Relents and recoils, and climbs and closes,
>   As a wave of the sea turned back by song.
> There are sounds where the soul's delight takes fire,
> Face to face with its own desire;
>   A delight that rebels, a desire that reposes:
>   I shall hate sweet music my whole life long.

Mr. Swinburne has surely been a musical critic in some previous state of existence, for how otherwise could he have written with such prophetic truth of the feelings of that over-abused person?

Carl Frederik Edmund Neupert died in New York on June 22nd. He was well-known in the States as a pianist, teacher, and composer, but before then achieved great success in Russia, Sweden, and Denmark. After the death of Nicolas Rubinstein he carried out a long-cherished intention and established a very successful school in his native city, Christiania. About the end of 1882 he migrated to New York, where he mostly remained till his death.

We hear of a new chair, the back of which is hinged so as to fall down on the seat, and which can be turned sideways, so as to have an alleyway nearly the width of the seat. On the back of the chair is a rack for a coat and an umbrella, and underneath the arm a place for opera-glasses and a programme. Under the seat is a hat rack. When this is generally introduced into our theatres, the few fees then remaining will be rendered endurable.

Had such a chair been in use at Covent Garden, perhaps Mr. Bousfield—who is rather recklessly described in an evening contemporary as a "well-dressed young man," young men who can afford £1 seats at the Opera, being invariably well-dressed, even if their seniors can afford to ignore some of the proprieties of fashionable life—would not have had cause to drag Augustus Druriolanus to the Westminster County Court to answer for his misdeeds. It seems that Mr. Bousfield objected to fees, and preferred to take his umbrella to his seat in the amphitheatre stalls, and as the attendants would not relax the rule against such a desecration, he wended his sorrowful way homewards. He had to do the same on Wednesday, as Judge Bailey decided that he had no right to take in cloaks or umbrellas in face of the printed notice prohibiting such useful, but much-in-the-way articles, and as, in his opinion, the rule was a very proper one, and the charge only 6d., he gave a verdict for the defendant, with costs. Perhaps Mr. Harris will, next season, see his way to do at Covent Garden as he does at Drury Lane, and abolish these fees, even if the charge is reasonable. So many things have been done for the comfort of his visitors, that such a trifling affair as these cloak room fees should not, in future, deter any Mr Bousfields from hearing Albani or de Reszke, or whoever may please their fancy most.

Mr. Joseph H. Gittings is now in England. He has brought his family and a pupil with him, and intends doing Bayreuth and some interesting musical centres on the Continent, then returning to this, his native country, leaving for his adopted home in the "Italy" on August 30th.

Miss Alice Maude Whitacre left America at the end of last month. She will spend the season in Switzerland, and, as we announced some time back, return to us in September. Many others besides ourselves will be pleased to see her and hear her again in London.

A correspondent of the Chicago Herald says of a well known song, "Annie Laurie was born in 1827, and was about seventeen years old when the incident occurred which gave rise to the song bearing her name. James Laurie, Annie's father was a farmer who lived on and owned a very large farm called 'Thraglostown,' in Dumfriesshire, Scotland. He hired a great deal of help, and among those he employed was a man by the name of Wallace to act as foreman, and while in his employ Mr. Wallace fell in love with Annie Laurie, which fact her father soon learned and forthwith discharged him. He went to his home, which was in Maxwelton, and was taken sick the very night he reached there, and the next morning when Annie Laurie heard of it she came to his bedside, and waited on him until he died; and on his deathbed he composed the song entitled 'Annie Laurie.'"

Miss Hope Glenn has arranged for a season of 20 concerts in Boston and elsewhere next season, under the management of Mr. Hathaway.

We lately referred to the improvements made by Mr. Edison in the phonograph, which are likely to make it most valuable to the musician. But, according to the latest American news, Mr. Edison has gone still farther in the path of progress. He has so modified his instrument that it transforms the piercing yells of any baby into most delightful melody. Verily, Mr. Edison deserves well of his fellows.

M. Emile Zola, according to the Italian journals, has granted to M. Stiatti, a Florentine, the right of founding an operetta on his "Nana." We do not envy composer or audience the privilege of wallowing in what Lord Tennyson, with more truth than art, calls the "troughs of Zolaism."

M. Alphonse Daudet and M. Gounod are going to stay with the accomplished Queen of Roumania, who writes so charmingly under the name of Carmen Silva. Certainly things are changed since the time when musicians and authors were classed with vagabonds. We can give no better advice to the parvenu, whose highest hope it is to fare sumptuously, and to sit at queens' tables, than this, that he should forthwith write a new "Sapho" or "Faust."

The "Automatic" system has at last produced something of benefit to the musical world, if a contemporary is to be believed. It is no doubt an excellent thing to be able to procure a cigarette or a cake of chocolate by "putting a penny in the slit," but, after all, the musical world is not greatly benefited thereby. But an ingenious Yankee has started a company to provide opera-goers with lorgnettes. At the back of each fauteuil is a neat box, into a slit in which one has to drop a 25 cent. piece, when a drawer opens, and a pair of opera glasses is seen. The drawer will only close when the opera glasses are replaced, from which fact it may be safely inferred, adds our contemporary, that a good many drawers will remain open after the performance.

We regret to learn that M. Ernest Frank, the well-known chapel-master at the Court of Hanover, has hopelessly lost his reason, and that it has become needful to place him in an asylum. M. Frank has written some very clever works, of which the best known is, perhaps, "La Tempête." Probably the anti-Wagnerians will point to this melancholy fact as another result of Wagnerism.

The latest quarrel between Count Hochberg, the director of the Berlin Opera and his artists has resulted in the resignation of M. Joseph Sucher, who has occupied the post of Kapellmeister. M. Sucher is probably remembered best in England as the husband of Madame Rose Sucher, whose successful appearances in London are still fresh in the memory of many opera-goers. M. Félix Mottl is spoken of as M. Sucher's probable successor.

A committee has been formed in France to erect a statue in honour of Mèhul. The statue will be erected at Givet, the birthplace of the illustrious composer of "Joseph and his brethren," and M. Ambroise Thomas has addressed a letter to all those likely to be interested in the matter, asking their co-operation in the work.

Toujours les femmes. The ladies are to the fore again at the Paris Conservatoire, where the first prize for counterpoint and fugue has been carried off by Mdlle. Gonthier, and the first prize for organ-playing and improvisation by Mdlle. Boulay. The success of the latter young lady deserves additional interest from the fact that she is blind. This is another admirable instance of the perfection to which the education of the blind has been brought, and should afford encouragement to those who have been instrumental in founding the Normal College at Norwood.

Among the officers who form the suite of the Emperor of Germany on his visit to the Czar is one of the name of Glinka, a relative of the composer of "Life for the Czar." Most Russian composers are, as a matter of fact, either military officials or civil servants in a high position. Tschaikowski and Borodini are cases in point.

Correspondence.

To the Editor of THE MUSICAL WORLD.

Sir,—Could any of the readers of your paper tell me whether the late Emperor of Germany's favourite hymn is published at all in England? The hymn is "Thou callest us to higher joys." Music by Buck.—Yours etc.,

Esher. J. E. ADKINS, F.C.O.

"GO TO BAYREUTH!"

We reprint from The Meister (the journal of the Wagner Society) the following excellent summary of a lecture delivered some time since at Trinity College, by Mr. Julius Cyriax, the hon. sec. of the society. Its persual may assist in determining the question uppermost in so many minds just now, "Where shall we go?"

". . . . Mr. Cyriax having enjoyed the privilege of Wagner's friendship, was able to enliven his lecture with many of those little touches which lift a lecture of this class from the dead level of generalities to that of a characteristic sketch of individual impressions. He recalled the fact that when in the year 1877, the German Liederkranz of London entertained Wagner at a banquet, at which were assembled all the greatest representatives of art, the Meister proposed one toast, and one only, that of the health of his old friend and supporter, Mr. Ferdinand Praeger, in these words 'Er war mit mir in der Wüste' (he was with me in the wilderness). Mr. Praeger had, as early as 1855, begun the work of advocacy of Wagner's genius which the Wagner Society is now carrying on; Wagner never forgot his services, and showed to him a gratitude such as that he always evinced for Liszt.

"Passing by these personal recollections, we must now give a short résumé of the lecture in its general bearings. Mr. Cyriax dealt first with the general state of music in the present day, and pointed out how that, while in New York a guarantee of £10,000 a year had been arranged for the ensurance of performances of Wagner's dramas, and while in Germany there were no less than forty-eight stationary companies engaged in the representation of operas throughout the year, by most of which companies Wagner's works were frequently rendered (641 performances of Wagner's works having been given in Germany last year), yet in England there was not even one stationary opera company, to say nothing of the length of time which had elapsed since the riper products of Wagner's genius had been brought to a hearing here. He added that, except in the case of oratorio, we were at a discreditable disadvantage when compared with Berlin, even in the matter of symphonic concerts. He said, 'In Berlin there are several orchestral concerts every night; with the exception of the Crystal Palace concerts, there are in London about thirty in the year. If London were as musical a town as Berlin—not from a Wagnerian, but from a general point of view—there ought to be ten symphonic concerts every night in different parts of the town." He then referred to the lack of interest betrayed by the London public, not only when Mr. Henschel produced Wagner's symphony, but when he brought out a symphony by an Englishman such as Mr. Cowen:—'Should it not have been the duty of every Englishman to go there and applaud Mr. Cowen, so talented a young Englishman? Why not be proud of such a man? Yet, what was the result? Forty people in the balcony, and the stalls half empty, whilst within a few yards four music-halls were crowded to suffocation.'

"Proceeding to the subject proper of his lecture, Mr. Cyriax gave three reasons for going to Bayreuth: first, because of the artists; secondly, because of the public; and thirdly, because of the general conditions under which the performances are given. We have not space to go into a detailed review of these three heads, and must content ourselves with quoting a few sentences bearing on each.

"The Artists.—Mr. Cyriax said, 'We see in Bayreuth a working together of all the forces that are necessary to ensure a good representation, such as is not found anywhere else in the world. From the conductor to the lamp-lighter, there is such a harmony, such a desire to do the best that possibly could be done to please Wagner when he was alive, and, now that he is gone, to go on acting in his spirit, that the performance is not equalled anywhere. It is now the highest honour that can possibly be conferred on a German artist to be allowed to sing at Bayreuth. You cannot think how that honour is coveted, and how many apply for it, and how happy they are to be able to say, 'I have sung at Bayreuth.' So far, at least, has Wagner succeeded in raising his art-work, that the artists are all for him, and always have been for him.' Under this heading the lecturer pointed out how Wagner himself had trained his singers, and how incomparable a stage-manager he was; with the consequence that "in Bayreuth you hear the actors declaim in a perfectly different way from those of other stages, because he told them word by word and note by note—'This is how I will have it.'" Mr. Cyriax also touched upon the self-sacrifice with which Bayreuth artists of the first rank accept utterly insignificant rôles.

"The Public.—"When Wagner chose Bayreuth he had in his mind the old Olympia. Why did the Olympian games survive a thousand years? Because they were far removed from the centres of population. People had to travel miles and miles to get to Olympia; they prepared themselves long before. In the same way, at Bayreuth the public is ready, with eyes, mind and heart open, to receive those tremendous impressions which, to a certain extent, pass by the tired-out public of the great cities." Mr. Cyriax related a little story of an unfortunate young man who interrupted the silence of the audience by addressing a remark to his neighbour, and was received with the shaking of that neighbour's fist, and the muttered imprecation "Sie elender!" (You wretch!). It is in this spirit that the whole conduct of the public is tacitly carried out; no sound, no interruptions, no rustling of the leaves of text-books, no encores, no applause.

"The general Condition of the Performances.—In this respect also, Mr. Cyriax showed how unique Bayreuth is; no destruction of the illusion by the never-resting gestures of conductor and orchestra, no ringing of bells or thumping of Heruclean clubs on the floor, in the French fashion, to call the attention of the audience to the commencement of an act. One of the chief 'motives' is sounded outside the theatre a few minutes before the appointed hour; and then, "when the public are inside the building, the motive is repeated from the depth of the back of the stage. Of course, we now know how to behave in that theatre. We sit down, and one unanimous 'ssh-h-h' goes through the theatre, and in one moment there is a silence such as I have never witnessed elsewhere; I may call it the Bayreuth silence, it is so completely unparalleled. And then down goes the gas, and you sit in perfect night, with only a faint glimmer from the lights below, from the invisible orchestra. Then the silence seems to grow still deeper, and you hear a slight tick, that sends a thrill through the house; that is Lévy calling his visible force together in the invisible orchestra. Another few seconds, which seem like centuries: then the heavenly melody of the introduction of 'Parsifal' rises into the air. You do not know where it comes from. Is it above you? Is it beneath you? Is it beside you? You feel it rather than hear it. How can any one sit in that theatre in these moments without being deeply moved?" Mr. Cyriax then pointed out many minor facts of interest with regard to the performance, especially the advantage of being able to leave the theatre for nearly an hour between the acts, and gain fresh receptive power by straying among the surrounding pine-forests. As to a little detail, we are at variance with the lecturer, for he sets the time at which the first act of 'Parsifal' (commencing at four p.m.), terminates at ten minutes past five, whereas our repeated experience would fix it at nearer to a quarter to six. But this was probably a mere slip of the tongue.

"Not only were we told to 'go to Bayreuth,' but how to get there; and, for the benefit of intending pilgrims, we repeat the useful information. 'The quickest way to go to Bayreuth is to take the evening train at eight o'clock' (whether from Victoria, Charing Cross, or Liverpool Street, the time of departure varies only about half an hour). 'You find yourself in a sleeping-car, and reach Nuremberg the next evening. I would advise you to stop there for a night, and go to Bayreuth the next morning, either at six or nine o'clock' (a journey of two or three hours by special express on the days of performance). 'The cost of the return journey, I find, is, viâ Calais, without sleeping compartment, £10 8s. 6d.; by Flushing, £8 4s. 6d.; by Harwich or Rotterdam, £8 1s. 9d. Second-class, of course, the journey is cheaper; and the cheapest route is by Harwich, as you can go all the way there and back for £5 10s., second-class.'

"After relating many of the aspects of social intercourse at Bayreuth, notably the artistic reunions at the friendly tables of the Angermann beer-house, where all the musical and literary world foregathers; the unique procession of notabilities on the upward route to the theatre-crowned Bayreuth hill; the general facilities for simple but comfortable accommodation, etc., etc., the speaker closed a lecture, followed by his audience with profound attention, with a final appeal—'Go to Bayreuth,' quoting the words of Gurnemanz in 'Parsifal':—

> Hört Ihr den Ruf!
> Nun danket Gott
> Dass Ihr berufen ihn zu hören.

"By way of epilogue, Mr. Cyriax gave an interesting analysis and pianoforte rendering of the 'Parsifal' prelude."

CORNEY GRAIN.*

This is essentially an age of interviewing and gossip; the world is being flooded with reminiscences, and everyone who has anything to say is saying it in hot haste, lest he should be forestalled by another reminiscence-monger. "Shall I then hold aloof from the great army of autobiographers?" asks Mr. Corney Grain in the opening pages of the little volume which lies before us. "No, I will fight in the ranks with my brave companions of the pen, even though I handle that dangerous weapon somewhat awkwardly." Thus, and with an apology upon his lips, the king of society entertainers enters upon what would appear to be an eminently congenial task.

Mr. Grain's autobiography is partially biographical, and largely anecdotal. The self-interviewer has not much to say, and what he does say is not of much importance. As he himself naively states at the end of the book, the little reminiscences are put down without much idea of consecutive order, and in a somewhat hasty and desultory manner. In fact, as Mr. Gilbert somewhere remarks with regard to the House of Lords, he has to say nothing in particular, but says it very well. It is a desultory book, merely pour passer le temps, and neither lays claim to, nor has literary style.

The biographical facts may be shortly summarised as follows:—

Surname...	Grain.
Christian Name ...	Richard Corney.
Condition	Bachelor.
Born	Oct. 26th, 1844.
Education	Average Middle Class.
Profession	Barrister, April, 30, 1866. Entertainer, May 16, 1870.

Mr. Grain, however, is more discursive about his early recollections. He was born at Teversham, about four miles out of Cambridge, and anyone at all acquainted with the locality needs no telling here that the name of Grain stands high amongst the yeomanry of that peaceful district. But we will draw the picture in Mr. Grain's own way.

> Picture to yourself a by-road turning off the road to Newmarket—a flat country, then a Rectory and church, a dirty pond, some farm-buildings and cottages; on the opposite side of the way the remains of the village stocks, the Rose and Crown, kept by one Muggleton (good name, I always thought, for a publican); then more cottages, a farm with orchard containing an excellent mulberry tree, the blacksmith's; then a cottage tenanted by an old Mrs. Oliver, who prepared feathers for feather beds; then Hancock's the carpenter's house; and then in some meadows, or, as we called them, closes, our house! A farm-house, covered with ivy, with pretty lawns and gardens, and a moat running round three-quarters of the grounds. A commonplace picture, you will say, of a Cambridgeshire village. Quite so, thoroughly commonplace. We boasted no remarkable characters in our village; perhaps the most remarkable was Mr. Hancocks aforesaid. He was a bleary, red-faced, red-eyed old man, with a stubbly unshorn chin and a paper cap. He was principally noted for being frequently drunk, habitually using bad language, and more especially for having once been a clown in a circus.
> There were no village schools; I believe an old Mrs. Chapman kept a dame's school, but I doubt if she could read. The clergyman of the parish did no visiting among the poor; he was a canon of Ely, and I particularly liked the period when he was in residence, because his locum tenens presented me with a little box of sweets every Sunday. There were no amusements for the people of the parish—only the Village Feast once a year, which began and ended in beer. The church services were bald, meagre, and altogether disgraceful. In winter there were no lights in church, and the sermon was read by the light of a bedroom candle, which was handed up by the footman. Whether it was the association of bed with the candlestick, or the sermon, I don't know, but the result was sleep. Then we knew the sermons by heart.

* Corney Grain. By Himself. London: John Murray.

> or should have done had we ever listened. They recurred at regular intervals, and the potato disease always brought out a very old friend—on Resignation. We decorated the church at Christmas with extreme simplicity; a gimlet-hole was bored in the top edge of the pews, and small pieces of evergreen were stuck in, and generally declined to stand upright. These sparse and diminutive boughs rather gave the impression of a field that has been bushed for the prevention of poachers' nets. But the crowning point of the service was the music. The clerk (one Gilson, who soled and heeled shoes in the world), left his desk and went up into a little gallery, in which sat certain gentlemen, viz., Mr. Pomfret, Mr. Muggleton, and Mr. Lane. The two former played clarionets, the latter the violoncello. As a trio the combination of instruments is odd, but not so odd as the sounds produced by the executants. There was no attempt at harmony, or even of melody, in unison. Each individual went his own way, or rather the way his instrument chose to take him. The clarionets were particularly erratic in their ways, and produced "alarums and excursions" at the most unexpected moments. The clerk gave out one line of the hymn, and then proceeded to sing it as a solo, while the clarionets and violoncello gambolled round the melody—not quite there, but there or thereabouts. We never joined in, but stood respectfully listening to this nasal-voiced shoemaker snuffling forth some dreary tune, while Discord reigned triumphant round and about him.

Alas! the dear old soul whom Mr. Grain calls "Mrs. Oliver" is no more; the machine demon and foreigners now do this honest gossip's work; the singing gallery and the violoncello have departed; and the nasal-voiced shoemaker has shuffled off his coil.

We must pass by the record of the author's early musical efforts; of his first appearance, in 1865, in a back drawing-room, in a real piece, when he joined the late Mr. John Clayton in "Plot and Passion;" by the astounding statement that he was then a raw, lanky, slim (yes, at that time!) youth of twenty—two yards of painful incompetence; and the "American portrait" of him, which appeared in the Chicago Tribune. Those who do not love Corney Grain may find a great deal of consolation in this criticism, which is quoted at length. Slowly Mr. Grain shook off the uncongenial profession of the law, and mounted, through penny readings and kindred smaller entertainments, to the proud position of a member of Mr. German Reed's Entertainment company. This was in May, 1870, and henceforth "good-bye to the Bar and its moaning."

We will not follow Mr. Grain through his mildly adventuresome career. Is it not written in the book? But we cannot help feeling that in all he says about himself and his critics, concerning his tours and his company, there is that goût de terroir which has made his personality so remarkable and, in many places, so much dreaded. What is more to the purpose, however, accounting as it does for the undoubted fact that a good deal that Corney Grain gives is hardly worthy, is the statement which he makes respecting his sketches, and how he writes them. Here is the passage:—

> I am sometimes asked what my system is in writing Sketches. I don t know; I have no system, except that of putting off everything to the very last. I write down notes on odd pieces of paper, on the backs of envelopes, on margins of newspapers, on invitation cards, in fact anything that comes handy. Sometimes I buy a twopenny washing account-book and make little notes with a dash thus: —. This last mystic sign means 'music,' to be worked out at the piano. Then, when the sketch is produced, I tear up the notes, and trust in the future to memory. What is the good of preserving sketches of a purely ephemeral nature, things lightly put together in a slight conversational style, only fitted to last some few months? The sketches must go out of fashion as quickly as the manners and customs they attempt to portray. In sketches of this description one deals with passing manias; the mania, perhaps, for putting bows of ribbon on incongruous pieces of furniture; for painting drain-pipes and panels of doors with lilies and daffodils; for giving a cheap Japanese appearance to a thoroughly European room by means of paper fans, screens, and umbrellas; for filling a drawing-room with so much furniture that it needs a guide to enable the bewildered traveller to avoid the pitfalls of poufs, ottomans, and little tables; for ladies to dance in amateur ballets, accompanied by their sisters and cousins and aunts on banjo, bones, and mandolines; or for young men to wear bangles—gages d'amour which will show themselves, much to the outward annoyance but inward delight of the wearers. All these things are but the follies of the hour; and if you wish for a record of such things, there are the pages of Punch, than which no better social record exists.

In fact, Corney Grain is the perambulating social recorder, the living Punch. As a rule, he is like Mr. Lenville in "Nicholas Nickleby," and is a "confounded quick study," yet some of his sketches certainly disclose the hurried hand.

The king of entertainers is a great traveller, and as an old cabman on the rank at St. George's Hall remarked, "Why, talk of Stanley and the Dark Continent, he ain't blooming well in it with the guv'nor. Ye never know where to 'ave 'im." And in his travels he has met many and divers personages. His anecdotes of these are perhaps among the most entertaining in the book. Here is a story told by a friend who was at the opera:—

> He entered into conversation with his next-door neighbour in the amphitheatre; they discussed various melodies, till my friend's next-door neighbour summed up the discussion thus: "Well, my favourite melody of all is 'Emma Parry'!" My friend pondered and pondered. Who was "Emma Parry"? Any relation of the great John Parry? At last in despair he asked what opera it was in. "In Martha!" Still he pondered. The opera he was listening to had no longer any charm for him—the magic name kept ringing in his ears. Emma Parry had taken possession of him; he rushed out, went to the nearest refreshment bar, and when asked what he would take, replied, "Emma Parry and soda;" he rushed to the Underground station: "Third-class for Emma Parry," he cried; he felt his wits going; he reached home; his wife noticed he was strange, heard him murmuring, "Emma Parry!" her jealous fears were aroused; confidence reigned no more in that hitherto peaceful and happy home. In the middle of the night he arose with a start. "I have it," he yelled: "M' appari!!!" Pronounce the "M" by itself, and then say "appari," and you get "Emma Parry"!

Mr. Grain, like all artistic natures, is eminently sensitive to outward criticism, and severe as he is upon the fashionable affectation the estilo culto of to-day, all sorts and conditions of men with whom he mixes return the compliment. There is no space to quote examples of this rough-and-ready criticism here, and it is very difficult to retain the original flavour of a passing event, in anecdotal form. Mr. Grain, perhaps a proud man, evidently laughs at himself for fear that others should forestall him. He confesses that he is always getting snubbed, and at times his vanity or his dignity suffers. It will disappoint many social tuft-hunters to learn that Mr. Grain has little to record that will interest or amuse concerning the great people that he has met, and he states that undoubtedly amongst the celebrities, the best audience that one can have is composed of great musicians. They know the difficulties of the task, and are always charitable. One more quotation, and we have done:—

> I sometimes think that my experiences must be somewhat similar to those of waiters. They must see much the same sort of society—like myself, they are 'in the movement'—they look after the tea and ices; I am in the music department.

There is little more to be said. The end of the book, in a great measure, is a resumé of what Mr. Grain has given us from time to time at St. George's Hall. Nevertheless, in this age of "shilling shockers," "Corney Grain; by Himself" should prove of considerable assistance in passing the time on a railway journey, or stimulating sleep on retiring to bed!

W. L. C.

MY DRUMMER.

From Daudet's "Trente ans de Paris."

One winter's morning, before I had risen, there came a knock at my door. "What is it?" "A man with a large box," was the reply. I supposed some package had come by rail, but instead of the expected porter, there appeared before me in the gloom of the November day, a little man in the round hat and short jacket of a Provençal rustic, with very black and restless, but withal gentle eyes, a simple yet stolid countenance, and a suspicion of garlic only partially neutralised by a thick moustache. This man announced himself, "Je suis Buisson," offering me a letter, on the superscription of which I at once recognised the handwriting of the poet Frédéric Mistral. His communication was short. "I send you my friend Buisson; he is a drummer, and desires a hearing in Paris. Be his guide."

Go about Paris with a drummer! These Southerners stick at nothing. I turned to Buisson. "It seems you are a drummer?" "Yes, Monsieur Daudet, and at the head of my profession, as you will see." And he went to fetch his instruments, which he had discreetly left the other side of the door—a little square flat box, and a large cylinder covered with green baize. The little flat box contained the fife, the little rustic flute which goes toot-toot! while drum goes pang-pang! The cylinder was the drum itself—and what a drum, my friends! The tears came to my eyes when I saw it unveiled; an authentic drum of the time of Louis XIV., its enormity suggesting both Tragedy and Comedy. With the utmost gravity, Buisson proceeded to hang the drum on his left arm, to take the fife between three fingers of his left hand, and with his right to agitate with an ivory-tipped bâton the enormous drum, which resounded incessantly with a buzzing noise, marking the time and supplying the bass to the thin, sharp notes of the little fife.

Toot—toot—pang—pang —toot — toot — Paris seemed far away, winter gone by—toot-toot—pang-pang—bright sunshine and Southern perfumes filled my room. I felt myself carried back to Provence, by the Poplars beside the Rhone; serenades sounded under the windows; there was singing and dancing. I saw in imagination the farandole winding under the leafy plane trees of the village greens, through the dust of the high roads, and on the sides of the hills, disappearing anon only to reappear more and more wild and life-like. And the drummer went to and fro with measured step, determined not to let the dance get the better of his music, gravely limping as with a movement of his knee he pushed the instrument before him.

All these things in the beat of a drum? Yes, and many more which you perhaps have never seen, but which were quite visible to me. The Provençal imagination is thus constituted; it goes off like gunpowder, even at seven o'clock on a winter's morning. Mistral was justified in relying upon my sympathy.

Buisson, too, had worked himself up. He related to me his struggles and his efforts, and how he had held to his fife and drum in spite of everything. Some barbarians, it appeared, had tried to improve upon the fife by adding two holes. A fife with five holes! What a sacrilege! He would always swear by the three-holed fife, the fife of his ancestors, and he would yield to no one in the impressiveness of his legato, in the brilliancy of his roulades. "It once happened to me," he lisped, with a modest and dreamy look, and with the peculiar Provençal accent, which would give a comic turn to the most pathetic sentiments, "it once happened to me, as I was sitting in the evening under an olive tree, listening to the nightingale, that I said to myself, How, how, Buisson, God's own nightingale does all that with one hole. Can't you manage to do as well with three holes?" A rather silly argument, by the way, but I was taken with it at the moment.

A genuine Southerner is not content until others share his emotions. I admired Buisson—therefore others must do the same. Behold me, therefore, carrying all over Paris, my drummer in tow, announcing him as a phenomenon, collecting friends, and organising a soirée at my house. Buisson played, told his story, repeated his "it once happened to me" (certainly this seemed a favourite phrase of his), and my friends went away apparently much impressed. This was only the first step. A piece of my own was in rehearsal at the Theâtre de l'Ambigu. The scene laid in Provence. I spoke of Buisson and his instruments to the manager, Hostein, you can imagine with what eloquence. I kept this up for a week, at the end of which he said, "Suppose we put your drummer into the play; it wants a finishing touch, and he might make a hit."

Next day the three of us, Buisson, the drum, and myself, took a cab and descended among a knot of idlers attracted by the strangeness of our appearance, and passed through the low and shabby doorway which, in the most luxurious theatres, forms the entrance (in no way resembling a triumphal arch) for authors, actors, and employés. "Heavens! how dark it is," sighed the Provençal, as we went along the corridor, damp and draughty, as all such places are. "How cold and dark it is!" The drum seemed to be of the same opinion, and bumped against every turn of the narrow passages—against every step of the corkscrew staircase, with vibrating groans, like curses, not loud but deep. At last, with much groping and stumbling, we reached the stage, where a rehearsal was proceeding.

How horrible a theatre looks in its undress—without movement, or life, or brilliancy; people glide about with noiseless tread, and speak under their breath, looking like dreary shades on the shore of the Styx, or like miners in a pit. Men and things, moving figures and fragments of scenery mingle in fantastic confusion, all ashen grey in the dim light conveyed from the gas jets veiled like Davy lamps. And as if to make the shadows heavier, and the underground sensation more intense, a door of a box would be opened now and again high up on the second or third tier, and let fall a gleam of daylight, like that from the mouth of a well, upon the depths beneath. This unfamiliar aspect of things somewhat disconcerted my countryman, but the good fellow quickly recovered, and courageously allowed himself to be placed all alone in the gloom at the extreme end of the stage, on a barrel which had been provided for him, so that with his drum there were two barrels, one on the top of the other. In vain I protested, in vain I said, "In Provence the drummer walks as he plays, so that your barrel is quite out of the question." Hostein assured me that my drummer was a minstrel, and that a stage-minstrel was always mounted on a barrel. So the barrel was determined on. Besides which, Buisson, always confident, had already mounted, and was balancing himself.

We leave him with the fife at his lips, the drum-stick in his hand, behind a virgin forest of scenery, footlights, ropes, and pulleys, instal ourselves—manager, authors, and actors—in front of the stage, as far away as possible, in order to judge of the effect.

"It once happened to me," came the voice of Buisson out of the gloom, "it once happened to me, as I was sitting in the evening under an olive tree, listening to the nightingale ——"

"All right, all right, play us something; I should," beginning to be irritated by his pet phrase.

Toot—toot, pang—pang . . . !

"Sh——! he is going to begin; we shall judge of the effect."

Alas for the effect produced on the sceptical audience by this pastoral music resounding from a far corner as shrill and tremulous as the hum of insects! I watched the sneering faces of those quizzical actors, always delighted by the discomfiture of a colleague; I saw the fireman exploding with laughter; I noticed the prompter, drawn out of his usual apathy by the unusual occurrence, lifting himself on his hands, his head appearing outside his box, like a gigantic tortoise.

Buisson, however, having ceased playing, took up the broken thread of his narrative, which he thought too pretty to be lost. "How now, Buisson, God's own nightingale does all that with one hole, can't you manage to do as well with three holes?" "What's the man mumbling about, with his holes and his nightingales?" asked Hostein. I endeavoured to explain the point of the story, the significance of three holes instead of five, the originality of one performer playing two instruments. "As a matter of fact, two could do it better," said Marie Laurent.

"A SILLY ACTION ABOUT A SILLY SONG."

The following letter, addressed by Mr. Boosey to the Editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, is well worth reprinting:—

"SIR,—The question raised by Mr. Arthur Roberts in his action against Messrs. Sheard is a far more important one than appears to be generally understood. The facts are of course well known. An American song, bearing the title of "The Accent On," suggests to Mr. Arthur Roberts the idea of a song upon similar lines. Mr. Roberts commissions author and composer to write for him new words and new music to the title in question. Messrs. Sheard thereupon publish the original American song, not only with Mr. Roberts's portrait upon the title page, but with a statement to the effect that their song is 'as sung by him.'

"What I submit is this. Mr. Roberts labours under the apparent disadvantage of being a comic singer; therefore his action is dismissed as trumpery. But I maintain that if, for the sake of argument, a publisher had published an imitation of a song sung by a leading concert singer, and had wrongly stated upon the title of the same that the song was sung by Mr. ——, an enlightened judge would have decided, and rightly, that the defendant was not entitled to the wrongful use of another man's name for the purpose of his own pecuniary benefit. It is not my province to take up the cudgels on behalf of Mr. Roberts or his song, but it seems to me that, whatever the merits of the composition, Mr. Roberts is as fully entitled to the pecuniary value of his name and reputation as singers moving in what judges, whose classical taste is proverbial, may be pleased to consider a more elevated sphere.—Yours obediently,

"WILLIAM BOOSEY.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE RENAISSANCE OF MUSIC.

By Norton Latham, M.A., Mus. Bac.

IV.

This, then, was the absolute and great change of the renaissance, and its influence on music was exactly the same as its influence on every other art; the drama and dramatic ideas taking the lead instead of church music, the abstract yielding to the concrete, religion being supplanted by realism.

It is outside my subject to carry the parallel beyond the renaissance, but it might be done down to the present date; and the development of art in music would be found to have followed the same course under some superior controlling energy which it had followed in painting and in architecture. Living men can bear record to the Gothic architecture, followed by the pre-Raphaelite school of painting, and then by the reappearance of Gregorian tones in churches.

Before I conclude, may I refer to one or two of the minor technicalities in music which accompanied the renaissance change, and which serve further to illustrate my parallel?

They were, first, the abandonment, even in church music, of the old tones, and the universal adoption of the modo lascivo which is our modern major scale. A better proof of the substitution of direct Nature worship for pure devotion to an imperfectly realised Deity could not be found. Then we have the first introduction of unprepared discords by Monteverde, a change which was to go, no man then conceived how far. This again is an example of the growth of sensuousness, which had already manifested itself in other arts. Again, and from my point of view the most important, there was apparently associated with the new idea of expressing the words the discovery of the greatest vehicle for rendering expression in music—the crescendo and decrescendo, for Valle, whom I have quoted already, speaks of the earlier singers as deficient in swelling and diminishing the voice by minute degrees. Lastly, there was in the change from the complication of many parts to the simplicity of the monodia, a change exactly similar to that which the renaissance had effected in other arts. Want of direct composition is one of the characteristics of art in the middle ages. Pictures not unfrequently break themselves up into a vast numbers of separate pictures like the parts of the old musicians. Sometimes on the same panel are depicted incidents varying in time. One of the most evident results of a feeling towards the classic was the appearance in painting of a very stiff and symmetrical arrangement of figures from which was developed in the time of the renaissance that simplicity of composition which dignifies the works of Perugino or Fra Bartolomeo, and that greatest of all simple compositions, Raphael's "Madonna di San Sisto." Similarly, in architecture, the varied complexity of the Gothic yielded to the simple composition of the classical.

I may also mention one strange thing connected with this period. Up to the end of the sixteenth century the treble parts in the churches of Rome were sung in falsetto by Spaniards, who came, no doubt, to Rome through Naples. In the year 1601, the first evirato appeared as a singer in Rome, and by the year 1625 these singers had completely taken the place of the Spanish falsetto singers. This was a sacrifice of principle to the practical, a kind of sacrifice likely to suggest itself under the influence of renaissance thought; and it is, to say the least, remarkable that it should have coincided, in point of time, with the full effect of the renaissance influence on music.

Wonderful, indeed, then must have been that marvellous current of thought which, uniform in its action, bent first literature, then architecture, then painting, then sculpture, and finally music, one and all, in the same direction.

TEMPLE CHURCH.

"The decision is usually said to have been made at length by Jeffries, who was not, however, "Lord Chief Justice" at the time, as he became Lord Chancellor in 1685, and continued in that office until 1690. The late Dr. Rimbault suggested that the contest might have been decided by vote, and that Jeffries happening to be 'of the house,' it fell to his lot to give the casting vote.

"Harris's organ—removed without loss of reputation to its builder—is said to have been divided, a portion being sent to the Cathedral of Christ Church, Dublin, and the remainder erected in St. Andrew's Holborn.

"The so-called 'remainder' contained the following stops, which it will be interesting to compare with the list attached to Smith's 'Bargaine,' given as No. 1 in the Appendix.

Great Organ (12 stops).

1 Open Diapason
2 Stopped Diapason
3 Principal
4 Twelfth
5 Fifteenth
6 Tierce
7 Larigot
8 Sesquialtera, III. ranks
9 Mixture II. ranks
10 Cornet to C^1 sharp V ranks
11 Trumpet
12 Clarion

Choir Organ (11 Draw-stops).

13 Open Diapason
14 Stopped Diapason
15 Principal Bass
By communication from Great Organ.
16 Principal to Tenor C
17 Flute
18 Open Flute to Middle C^1
19 Twelfth to Middle C^1
20 Fifteenth
21 Tierce
22 Vox Humana

Compass of great and choir, GG, short octaves, to D^3 in alt, 52 notes. Contents of echo not recorded.

"Among other reasons which led to the choice falling on Smith's organ, were its greater 'sweetness and fulness of sound, besides ye extraordinary stopps, quarter notes, and other rarityes, therein,' the quarter notes being two additional chromatic semitones in each octave, A flat and D sharp, which improved certain scales; and its greater 'Depthe and strengthe of sound,' arising from the presence of all the diatonic notes from CC down to FFF, and the chromatic note BB flat.

"About forty-six years ago, on the completion of the restoration of the Temple Church—re-opened for Divine Service on the 20th of November, 1842—what was then a new departure was taken by the Benchers of the Two Honourable Societies, which was followed by such great and beneficial results, that as a matter of history it is necessary to notice it here, namely, the establishment of a choral service and a surpliced choir. At that time (1842) there were only three such choirs in London, namely, those at St. Paul's Cathedral, Westminster Abbey, and the Chapel Royal, St. James's Palace. The Musical World of the time, after announcing that 'this venerable structure (the Temple Church), which has for a considerable length of time been undergoing a series of renovations, will be re-opened next month in all its pristine appropriateness and splendour;' and that 'the fine old organ, proverbial for its sweet and mellow tones, has been repaired and enlarged;' went on to say, 'and a choir of about fourteen voices, including six boys, has been engaged to perform th regular cathedral service. This is an example that deserves to become a precedent for the more suitable solemnization of the church ordinances, in other important and wealthy establishments.' The 'precedent' set in so renowned a church was speedily and extensively followed, until there are now in London, of surpliced choirs alone, over five hundred; and the taste for church and congregational music, with an organ adequate to their due accompaniment, was never in a more living or fostering condition in the Two Honourable Societies of the Temple than at the present time."

Geo. Miniett. Tho. Griffin. Rich^{d}. Cook.

The organ was twice improved by Robson and Co., in 1849 and 1850. The instrument also contained work by Byfield, Bishop, and Schulze.

It is curious to note that Robson's original pedal-board had "C under C" as decided up at the College of Organists' conference, though the measurements were otherwise probably different. The following is the specification of the organ as reconstructed and enlarged by Messrs. Forster & Andrews, 1878:—

Total Number of Pipes in Organ, 3,709.

The total list of candidates for the two sections, F.C.O., and A.C.O., is larger by a considerable number than upon any previous occasion, reaching as it does some 185 in all. On Friday (yesterday), the diplomas of F.C.O. were handed to the successful candidates by Dr. W. B. Gilbert, of New York, who, it is interesting to note, was one of the first members and Fellows of the College. The A.C.O. examination will take place next week; paper-work on Tuesday, organ-playing on Wednesday and Thursday. On Friday next, at 11, at the Bloomsbury Hall, Hart Street, the diplomas will be distributed by that distinguished church musician and organist, Dr. G. Garratt, M.A., of Cambridge. The annual meeting of members will take place on Tuesday, July 31st. Owing to the examinations not taking place until the end of the month—an arrangement made in view of the convenience of the candidates—this may be in part a formal meeting, as it may not be possible to get all the accounts duly audited in time. Still the meeting will no doubt have its interesting features to the members of the institution, even though it may be found necessary as a matter of form to adjourn the proceedings. In accordance with a law which empowers the Council to make such appointments with a majority of at least three-fourths of that body, Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, Dr. G. C. Martin, and Professor C. Villiers Stanford, Mus. Doc., have been elected Vice-Presidents of the College of Organists.

RECITAL NEWS.

PARISH CHURCH OF FOLKESTONE.—An organ recital was given by Mr. Alfred Oake, L.R.A.M., A.C.O., organist of Parish Church, on June 27th, 1888. There was a large attendance of listeners. The following pieces were played:—Chorus, "God save the King," Handel; Sonata in C minor, Mendelssohn; Andante in F, Smart; Toccata and Fugue in D minor, J. S. Bach; Fantasia on "O Sanctissima," Lux; Etude in B flat, Heller; Prayer, "Rienzi," Wagner; March Solennelle, Lemaigree.

S. ALKMUND'S CHURCH, DERBY.—The opening of new organ (built by Lewis and Co., Limited, Brixton, London, cost £1,150), took place on July 4th. Mr. E. H. Turpin was the player. Recitals were also given by Mr. Corbett, Mus. Doc., FC.O., on July 5th, and by Miss Knight, F.C.O., on July 11th, and Mr. H. A Wheeldon, F.C.O., on July 12th.

McCarrell; July 4th, Passacaglia, E minor Sonata (Rheinberger); Concert Piece (G. E. Whiting), Mr. C. E. Mores; July 4th, afternoon, Toccata in F major (Bach); Fantasie in E minor, manuscript (Merkel) dedicated to Clarence Eddy; Concert variations on "The Star Spangled Banner"; Sonata, No. 10, op. 146 (Rheinberger); Concert Piece in E flat minor (Thiele), Mr. Clarence Eddy; July 5th, Allegro, Organ Sonata, op. 42 (Guilmant); "A Russian Romance" (Hoffmann), Mr. Harrison M. Wild; July 6th, Fugue on Choral; Meyerbeer's "Prophet" (Liszt); Marche, Funebre and Chant Seraphique (Guilmant).

Notes.

At the Church Parade of the Third City Rifles at St. Bride's, Fleet Street, on Sunday last, the band was employed with the organ in accompanying the hymns and in the performance of one voluntary, with marked and imposing effect. This combination seems to have been frequently employed of late with, as a rule, distinct success.

Dr. E. J. Hopkins and his friend, Mr. R. M. Rogers, the well-known organist of Doncaster Parish Church, are about to take a tour through Germany to inspect interesting organs. A good many years ago Dr. Hopkins made several similar journeys with Mr. Rogers's father, a famous organist of his day. It is to be hoped the travellers' notes will be available for publication upon their return.

Organ recitals are being given constantly at the Crystal Palace, on Walker's grand organ at the Glasgow Exhibition, and frequently upon the instrument at the Irish Exhibition, built by Mr. Wedlake. Willis's fine organs at the Albert Hall and the Alexandra Palace should, according to prevailing opinion, be more frequently heard, under the hands of leading players.

The suggestion is made that at our great musical festivals, held in cathedrals and large concert halls in the future, organ concertos might be given with special advantage. An organ concerto in a cathedral ought to produce a grand artistic result.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS' CALENDAR.

July 24th, 25th, 26th, A.C.O. Examination; July 27th, Diploma Distribution at 11, at the Bloomsbury Hall, Hart Street, when the Diplomas will be distributed by Dr. Garratt, M.A., Organist to the University and St. John's College Cambridge; and July 27th, Council Meeting at 10. July 31st, Annual General Meeting at 8. Other arrangements and particulars will be duly announced.

HIGH AIMS.

In the flush and ardour of youth many a budding musician enters upon his career with a feeling that most of his fellow-professionals show a want; that the majority of the public shows a want; and that he is the man destined to supply it. But the time of disillusion is not slow to arrive. Perhaps in no vocation is the disparity between the ideal and reality so discouraging to the young enthusiast as in music. The easy successes of mediocrity exasperate him; the failures of those belonging to what may be called the upper middle class of art oppress him with a sense of injustice; the supreme excellence of the few who, in any given generation have shown themselves able, by the mere force of pre-eminent gifts, to be original and yet live, fills him with a despairing sense of the unattainable. Discouraged on the one hand by the spectacle of achievement he knows to be above his reach, wearied on the other by the dreary monotony of the "vile flats" of art, and chafed by the limitation of his own powers, which prevents him from breathing freely, at any rate, for any length of time, in the higher atmosphere, he begins to speculate seriously whether the world, after all, contains any niche he can hope to fill as a musician, with satisfaction to himself or usefulness to others. In most cases this period of depression passes away, as did the overwhelming self-confidence — the product more often of ignorance than constitutional vanity—by which it was preceded, and to the much-increased comfort of his friends and associates, he quiets down and learns in time to appreciate the true significance of the facts of life in general, and of musical life in particular. Then, for the first time, it dawns upon him that every soldier cannot be a great general, every politician a ruler of dynasties, every painter a Michael Angelo, or every musician a Beethoven or Wagner; and that if all the ordinary mortals in the world abandoned their calling in disgust, simply because they could never hope to become cloud compellers, there would be scope neither for the great nor for the little.

Fortunately, too, those economic laws from the enforced contemplation of which very few, especially among musicians, are exempt, quickly throw their weight in the scale in favour of more sober and practical views. There is the livelihood that has to be gained, and the work that has to be done; and for that work to be successful, the whilom dreamer soon comes to realise the importance of adjusting his aims with due regard to the actual measure and limitations of his capacities. The American's answer to complaints of excessive competition, "there is plenty of room up at the top," offers but scant consolation to persons blessed with no more than fair average endowment; but these will do well to remember that it would be indeed an incalculable disaster, not only in art but in every walk of life, were the more humble workers to lose their sense of personal importance and personal responsibility as links in that vast chain of effort, one end of which is fixed to the ground below, while the other extends upwards till lost in the clouds. Thus the time inevitably comes to every young enthusiast, when he is compelled to strike a balance between the claims of a matter of fact world on the one hand, and of artistic ambition on the other, when, in short, he asks himself, "how high shall I aim?" In one sense it may be answered that in the interest alike of his aspirations and of his material requirements, he cannot aim too high, provided he has a just notion of the real meaning of the term, and has come to fully understand that "high aims" will best be furthered, not by imitative ventures beyond his strength, but by the incitement of his efforts to tasks in which the very best that is in him will have a fair chance of expression. There is one glory of a symphony, another of a little song successfully embodying the idea that belongs to it, and it is but a spurious, tinselly ambition that devotes itself to achievements on a large scale, simply because they are large. As Phaeton found out to his cost, not every one can handle with impunity the reins of the sun-chariot; or, for the benefit of readers who do not happen to be versed in mythological lore, we may refer them to the more homely but equally luminous fable of the rocket and the stick.

WAGNER IN ENGLAND.

In an article on the correspondence of Wagner and Liszt, which appears in the new number of the Quarterly, the following passages occur, relative to Wagner's experiences in England:—

Wagner's visit to this country, which is of special interest to English readers, plays a conspicuous part in this correspondence, and throws some new light on an important phase of the history of the Philharmonic Society, and of English music generally. We have been able to supplement Wagner's own indications, as contained in these letters, by the statements of contemporaries, and by one or two interesting documents hitherto unpublished. The hope of seeing his works appreciated by a nation so nearly allied to the Germans as the English, seems to have been entertained by Wagner for a long time. As early as June, 1849, he writes: "I am ready to go to London as soon as possible, to do all in my power for the performance of my works;" and soon afterwards we are informed that he had fixed upon a plan of having "Lohengrin" performed in London, and in English, even before it had been heard in the original. This is the passage alluded to:—

"Latterly I have accustomed myself to the notion of giving it to the world at first in a foreign language, and now I take up your own former idea of having it translated into English, so as to make its production in London possible. I am not afraid that this opera would not be understood by the English, and for a slight alteration I would be quite prepared. As yet, however, I do not know a single person in London. . . . Could you manage, dear friend, to write to London and to introduce my undertaking, and could you also let me know to whom to apply further?"

Liszt, as usual, was ready with his advice and his help, but he also had few connections in London, and the only person of whom he could think to apply to was Mr. Chorley, the influential critic, who, by the way, took subsequently a most hostile position to Wagner when he came to England. The immediate cause of that visit arose from a different and entirely unexpected quarter. In 1854, the Philharmonic Society, which at that time occupied the leading position amongst musical institutions in England, was undergoing a serious crisis. Sir Michael Costa had resigned his post of conductor, and to find a substitute for him was an extremely difficult task. At a meeting of the directors, many names were mentioned; some suggested Lindpaintner, others Spohr; others insisted upon appointing a musician of English birth, or at least residing in England. At last M. Sainton, the famous violinist, who at the age of seventy-five still lives amongst us in full possession of his mental and artistic faculties, rose to his feet and named Wagner. He himself had no personal cognizance of Wagner's capacities, neither had any of the other directors; but, as M. Sainton remarked, a man who had been so much abused must have something in him. This sentiment was received with acclamation, and it was unanimously resolved that a leap in the dark should be made. The result of that resolution appears in a letter from Wagner to Liszt, which is not dated, but evidently belongs to the very early part of 1855.

"To-day I was asked, on the part of the Philharmonic Society of London, whether I should be inclined to conduct its concerts this year. I asked in return (1) Have they got a second conductor for the commonplace things? and (2) Will the orchestra have as many rehearsals as I may consider necessary? If they satisfy me as to all this, shall I accept then? If I could make a little money without disgrace, I should be pleased well enough. Write to me at once what you think of this."

A little later, January 19th, 1855, he writes—

"I am able to-day to send you particulars about London. Mr. Anderson, treasurer of the Philharmonic Society and conductor of the Queen's band, came specially to Zurich to arrange the matter with me. I did not like the idea much, for it is not my vocation to go to London and conduct Philharmonic concerts, not even for the purpose of producing some of my compositions, as is their wish. On the other hand, I felt distinctly that it was necessary for me to turn my back once for all upon every hope and every desire of taking an active part in our own artistic life, and for that reason I accepted the hand held out to me. London is the only place in the world where I can make it possible to produce "Lohengrin" myself, while the kings and princes of Germany have something else to do than grant me my amnesty. It would please me very much if I could induce the English people next year to get up a splendid German opera with my works, patronised by the Court. I admit that my best introduction for that purpose will be my appointment as conductor of the Philharmonic (THE OLD), and so I consented at last to the sale of myself, although I fetched a very low price—£200 for four months. I shall be in London at the beginning of March to conduct eight concerts, the first of which takes place March 12th, and the last June 25th."

Wagner arrived in London late in February, and after staying for a short time at the house of his friend, Mr. Praeger, took rooms at 22, Portland Terrace, Regent's Park. M. Sainton relates that, one morning in February, at 9 a.m., a youthful-looking German called on him in full evening dress, in order to pay him an official visit as one of the Philharmonic directors. At first their intercourse was a little formal, and slightly impeded by Wagner's imperfect knowledge of French; but soon the ice began to thaw, and before an hour was over the two were chatting as if they had known each other for years, and from that moment they were fast friends, and remained, during Wagner's stay in London, inseparable. Wagner had few other acquaintances in London, and not being able to speak our language, was practically debarred from English society. His only intercourse, apart from M. Sainton, was with Mr. Praeger, also still alive; Mr. Lüders, a musical enthusiast and intimate friend of M. Sainton; Klindworth, at that time a very young pianist; and Hector Berlioz, who was conducting the new Philharmonic Concerts at the time. For him Wagner entertained a very lively admiration, which was not altogether reciprocated by the French composer, who later on gloated over the defeat of "Tannhäuser" in Paris in a manner little creditable to his heart. But all this was still in the distant future, and Wagner speaks of his newly-gained friend as one of the few acquisitions of his dreary London days.

"One real gain," he writes to Liszt, "I bring back from England—the cordial and genuine friendship which I feel for Berlioz and which we have mutually concluded. I heard a concert of the New Philharmonic under his direction, and was, it is true, little edified by his performance of Mozart's G minor Symphony, while the very imperfect execution of his "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony made me pity him. A few days afterwards we two were the only guests at Sainton's table; he was lively, and the progress in French which I have made in London permitted me to discuss with him for five hours all the problems of art, philosophy, and life, in a most fascinating conversation. In that manner I gained a deep sympathy for my new friend; he appeared to me quite different to what he had done before. We discovered suddenly that we were in reality fellow-sufferers, and I thought upon the whole I was happier than Berlioz. After my last concert he and the other few friends I have in London called upon me; his wife also came. We remained together till three o'clock in the morning, and took leave with the warmest embraces.

Berlioz, on his part, gives a description of their London friendship to Liszt, in which he says, "He is splendid in his ardour, and I confess that even his violence delights me. He has something singularly attractive for me, and if we both have asperities, those asperities dovetail with each other," accompanying the last remark by an indented line, the angles of which run in parallels.

Wagner's professional prospects appeared at first very bright. M. Sainton gives an interesting description of the first rehearsal, at which Wagner conducted the Heroic Symphony of Beethoven without book—at that time an almost unprecedented feat of memory, although since then Herr Richter and other conductors have imitated it. The orchestra and the few persons present were at once astonished and delighted at the new reading given to the familiar work, the delicacy of the nuances insisted upon, the intelligence and fire with which the melodies were phrased. After the rehearsal the musicians broke out into a storm of applause such as has been seldom heard in an English concert-room. Wagner himself was extremely pleased with his reception, as the following extracts will show.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

It is not perhaps a very sinful thing to confess that many, even of the most enthusiastic musical amateurs, have been looking forward to the end of the opera season with something like relief. Of course this implies nothing adversely critical to a season which has been exceptionally brilliant, and, as an original writer has remarked more than once in the course of the last two months, has "recalled the palmy days of Italian opera," whenever those palmy days were. But although Mr. Harris has succeeded in re-animating a thing so dead as Italian opera certainly seemed—and for this the lovers of that opera are duly grateful—he has produced no novelties of any sort, and the eternal round of familiar works must, sooner or later, lose something of its attractive power. But Mr. Harris is an astute man, and with characteristic wisdom, has kept some of the best things till the last. At any rate, it is not unfair to say that Verdi's "Aïda," and Boito's "Mefistofele" are not inferior in interest to the mass of the works previously produced. "Aïda" was given on Saturday last, and the large audience that then assembled to welcome it was sufficient evidence of the estimation in which it is held.

The title rôle was created, as far as England is concerned, by Madame Patti, who, however, did not find sufficient scope in it for her characteristic style. On the occasion in question, the part was taken by Madame Nordica, who, as far as singing went, filled it satisfactorily. She is not, however, sufficiently endowed with the dramatic intensity needful to the artist who would portray vividly the griefs of the captive princess. Charming Madame Nordica could not fail to be, and in passages requiring only grace and tenderness she could hardly have been excelled. But in such an opera as "Aïda" much more is required, and in these sterner qualities Madame Nordica was more or less wanting. The most interesting impersonation of the evening was certainly the Radames of M. Jean de Reszke, who resumed the part in which he made his début as a tenor in London some years ago. A comparison of these two performances will serve only to show that M. de Reszke has advanced steadily in the upward path towards perfection in his art. His voice is now certainly finer, his acting more powerful, than on the occasion to which we refer, and the assumption was of well-nigh matchless excellence. Signor D'Andrade's Amonasro was also an extremely powerful performance, full of what may be called the "local colour" appropriate to the savage Ethiopean King, without being in any way exaggerated. Another excellent feature of the performance was the Amneris of Madame Scalchi, who has rarely sung and acted better. Signor Miranda as the King of Egypt and Signor Navarrini as the High Priest were sufficiently satisfactory.

Although Boito's "Mefistofele" presents Goethe's poem in a form by no means easily understanded of the people, and owes its peculiarity to a plucky, if perhaps rather hopeless, attempt to embody the philosophical ideas of "Faust" as a whole, rather than (as in the case of Gounod's opera) the picturesque suggestiveness of its dramatic incidents, the great house was on Tuesday all but filled. Evidently "Faust" in any form is always welcome. The revival this season was marked by a departure from usual practices, which combines in one singer the parts of the two characters of Margaret and Helen. This inconvenient custom was replaced by the division of the parts, Miss MacIntyre taking that of Margaret, and Miss Ella Russell that of Helen. Miss MacIntyre is only a beginner, but in the prison scene she exhibited a strength and intensity quite unlooked for, while in the more purely romantic scenes she was charmingly fresh and girlish. Miss Ella Russell, it must be admitted, scarcely possesses the physical qualifications for the part of Helen, but she sang and acted throughout in an eminently satisfactory way, and formed a useful contrast to Miss MacIntyre. The general success of the evening, however, was certainly M. Edouard de Reszke's impersonation of Mefistofele, which was played with singular breadth and force, the scene of the Witches' Sabbath giving the great bass an especially good chance for powerful acting. The part of the fiend is, in Boito's work, of far deeper spiritual significance than in Gounod's opera, and makes heavier demands on the artist. These demands were met by M. de Reszke in the most complete way. The parts of Faust and Marta were taken by Signor Ravelli and Madame Scalchi respectively, in a thoroughly efficient way. The chorus and orchestra were excellent, and the mounting of the opera was elaborate and complete to the last degree.

TRINITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

The end of the summer term at this excellent institution was signalised, as usual, by the concert and subsequent distribution of prizes, which took place on the evening of Tuesday last. Such concerts are, of course, chiefly valuable as showing the quality of the instruction given, and, on the part of the student, promise rather than fulfilment. In both respects the concert in question was of the utmost interest, for in every individual performance there was evidence of careful and conscientious training, not less than of a high amount of capacity in the performer. To attempt detailed criticism of the concert would serve no good purpose, and we shall be content with singling out as especially praiseworthy the performance by Miss Florence Verey of Mozart's "Dove Sono"; by Miss E. B. Grose of Chopin's "Impromptu" in C sharp minor; by Miss Florence Young of Chaminade's "Fileuse"; and by Miss Edith Idle of Sterndale Bennett's "Maid of Orleans" sonata. Scarcely less interesting were the renderings by Miss Verey, Mr. A. J. Bonella, and Mr. G. A. Higgs of the trio from "The May Queen," and the organ solos by the Honourable Elizabeth St. Aubyn, who played Smart's "Andante in F" and Guilmant's "Canzone in A minor" with considerable taste and skill.

The distribution of certificates which followed bore further evidence of the thoroughness of the system in vogue at the College. It is obviously impossible to give any adequate list of the students who have distinguished themselves in various branches of their art. Some attempt may, however, be made to classify the certificates awarded, which were as follows:—

Choir training certificate	1
Counterpoint	1
Harmony	9
Certificated pianists	28
Associate pianists	17
Certificated vocalists	5

SENOR MANJON'S GUITAR RECITAL.

We in England have not been wont to think of the guitar as an instrument of importance sufficient to warrant its classification as a recital instrument. Romantic as it is in associations, conjuring up visions of sunny Seville, and serenading lovers, and senoritas in black mantellas, it would have seemed a little out of place in the unpoetic region of Piccadilly. Senor Manjon thinks otherwise, and the audience which assembled in Princes' Hall on Saturday afternoon seemed converted to his opinion. This was hardly wonderful, for additional interest attached to the concert on account of the performer's blindness, which lent to the concert a pathos otherwise lacking, and which would have accounted for the ready and sympathetic appreciation of the listeners, had the concert itself been less attractive. Senor Manjon's soli were of a comprehensive and ambitious sort. The player is a complete master of his instrument, and in the more legitimate performances, such as the "Valse" and "Polonaise," by Arcas, and the melody, "Primavera," by Senor Manjon himself, revealed a richness of tone and a wealth of expression hitherto unthought of. But we cannot commend the taste which suggested the andante from the "Moonlight" Sonata, as a composition suitable for the guitar. The result of this choice was an exhibition quite unworthy of the genuine artist that Senor Manjon undoubtedly is.

The performances of the concert-giver did not constitute the sole attraction of the afternoon. Miss Carlotta Elliott sang in excellent style two very pleasing and characteristic Spanish songs, a "Habanera," and "Romance," composed by Senor Manjon. Madame Bertini contributed Schubert's "Ave Maria," and Sullivan's "My Dearest Heart," and gave evidence of considerable ability, although she was obviously suffering from nervousness. Miss Esther Barnett, however, certainly supplied the most seriously interesting performances, playing Beethoven's "Thirty-two Variations in C Minor," Rubinstein's "Barcarolle," and Mendelsshon's "Presto Agitato," each of which she gave in a very refined and legitimate way, which told not only of the young lady's own artistic ability, but of the careful tuition of her master, Mr. Thomas Wingham.

M HOLLMANN'S CONCERT.

The concert given by the violoncello virtuoso, M. Hollmann, drew quite a crowd on Monday to Sir Julian Goldsmid's house, in Piccadilly. The artist's exceptional qualities of expression (especially remarkable for an almost unequalled pianissimo) and technique were again displayed, though an excessive use of the glissando in cantabile passages, and a somewhat rough and exaggerated forte, occasionally detracted from the absolute charm of his performances. It is a pity that M. Hollmann's arrangements from Schumann and Bizet, his own spirited Mazurka, and a capital "Carmen" fantasia, were placed at the end of the programme, whilst the "Batti, Batti" and the Adagio and Rondo from Beethoven's Pianoforte Quartet, given moreover rather crudely, and with "strings" instead of the original "wind," might, as merely portions of a whole, have been spared from a rather lengthy concert. Mr. Johannès Wolff distinguished himself in a (so-called) "Andante Religioso," by Thomé, and a Mazurka, by Wieniawski, by feeling and grace respectively; and Herr L. E. Bach introduced a set of clever "Danses Polonaises," for piano duet, of his own composition. In Massenet's "Air du Cid," Mdlle. Janvier, by reason of vocal powers showing signs of wear, was unable to do full justice to otherwise excellent intentions. She did far better in the concert giver's expressive "Chanson d'amour," with violoncello obbligato. Mdlle. Thénard, of the Comedie Française, obtained the usual encore for one of her humorous and pointedly rendered monologues, and the accompaniments were in the safe hands of Signor Bisaccia and Mr. Raphael Roche.

MISCELLANEOUS.

At Steinway Hall, on Friday evening, Signor Ellin Aramis gave his first concert before an English audience. The most noticeable items in the long and interesting programme were Bottesini's "Elegie" and "Tarantella," performed by the composer himself, in his own inimitable manner. The concert giver was suffering from horseness, and, apparently, too, from nervousness; his powerful baritone voice was, therefore, not heard to advantage, and it would be unfair to judge his merits as an artist from Friday's performance; we shall, however, it is rumoured, have an opportunity of hearing him in opera next year. He seemed most at home in settings, by Samarat Abt, of two songs in his native Greek tongue, one of which, "Koimoi," he repeated in response to an unanimous recall. Madame Sandon's rendering of Schumann's "Ich grolle nicht," elicited well-merited applause, Mdlle. Dufour and Mr. H. Williams gave an artistic rendering of Denza's graceful "Nocturne," and Signor de Cristofaro showed what sweet tone can be produced by a skilful player on the mandoline. Mdme. Sanderini and Signor Abramoff also contributed to the programme, and the accompaniments were, it is needless to say, safe in the hands of Signori Tosti, Denza and Ducci.

Mr. Raphael Gordon's concert was given on Wednesday evening last at Steinway Hall, and, taking into account the lateness of the season, a large and fashionable audience assembled. Mr. Gordon has an excellent tenor voice of considerable power and compass, which he displayed to advantage in a "Serenade" by Schubert, Mattei's "Non è ver," and Ascher's "Alice, where art thou?" the latter of which he had to repeat. A tendency to force the voice must, however, be checked. Mdlle. Marie de Lido was in splendid voice, her singing of Mattei's "Dear heart"—accompanied by the composer—being one of the features of the evening, while another was supplied by Miss Maud Boyd, who sang a charmingly piquant song by Odoardo Barri, "Vote for Cupid," with the greatest success. Mr. Frederick King sang in his usual effective style, and the pianoforte solos of Signor Tito Mattei and Mr. Gustav Ernst were given with the artist's usual ability. Mdlle. Hirsch contributed some violin solos, and Signor Odoardo Barri and Mr. Sidney Cooke proved efficient conductors.

Mdlle. Thénard, of the Comédie Française, who has for some years past brightened the London season with her elocutionary talents, has again concluded a series of recitations and of those delightful "levers de rideau" for which the French stage is justly celebrated, given in conjunction with that clever comedian, M. Demey, of the "Gymnase," at the Portman Rooms. The attractions of the last soirée were varied by musical selections, in which Mdlle. Galitzine particularly distinguished herself, displaying fine musical feeling, tasteful phrasing, and excellent technique in some very pleasing and difficult soli on the violoncello. Mdlle. Janvier and Mr. Isidore de Lara contributed some vocal pieces, and Signor Carlo Ducci acted efficiently as accompanist.

Mdlle. Jane de Vigne, of the Royal Opera, Brussels, of whom we had already occasion to speak in terms of warm praise, appeared to greater advantage than ever at her own matinée, at the Beethoven Rooms, where her versatility found fuller scope. Mdlle. de Vigne has a well cultivated soprano voice of rare freshness and flexibility, which she used with so much intelligence that it must be regretted that this clever artist is not to be heard oftener on the London stage. It would be difficult to say in which of her soli by Bizet, Delibes, Tosti (accompanied by the composer), Hollman (with violoncello accompaniment played by the composer), or duets with Signor Carpi, who distinguished himself as an excellent buffo, she did best, all being rendered in equally artistic style. Mdlle. Otto Brönnum sang with admirable taste Grieg's "Solveig's Song" and Kjerulf's "Last Night." The rich contralto of Miss Marion Mackenzie and the fine bass of Mr. Abramoff did full justice to their respective pieces. Amongst the instrumentalists Mr. Hollman's and Signor Carlo Ducci's soli on the violoncello and piano respectively, and the appropriate accompaniments supplied by Mdlle. Alice de Vigne deserve special notice. Mdlle. Thénard, of the Comédie Française, who has become a general favourite, obtained an irresistible encore by means of some highly characteristic and diverting recitations.

at Berlin, has brought forth the usual harvest of reminiscences and anecdotes, one of the most characterstic of which is as follows. Engel had conceived the brilliant idea of having a 'combination' cast in a small way, and to this end proposed to two famous singers, Nachbaur and Reichmann, that they should appear on one occasion in the same piece. The two artists, who had never been heard together, consented, and Engel proceeded to ask their terms. 'I will sing,' said Nachbaur, 'on condition of receiving half the takings.' 'And you?' said Engel, turning to the other. 'My terms are the same,' answered Reichbach, 'half the takings.' Engel, who knew the ways of artists, was in no wise disconcerted. 'Very well, gentlemen,' said he, 'I only ask you humbly to grant me an order for the performance, that at least I may be able to enter my own theatre!'"

The telephone is a very admirable thing when you know who is listening at the other end. It is not altogether pleasant to know that all your candid and unguarded remarks may be heard by some one a mile away, as the conductor of the Monnaie Theatre at Brussels chanced to discover. The history of his discomfiture is as follows:—The Queen of Belgium, it seems, had a telephone "laid on" to the theatre in question, and, unknown to the conductor, proceeded one day to listen to a rehearsal of "Les Templiers," which was then proceeding. Surrounded by some of her Court, the Queen sat listening for some time to the distant sounds, when suddenly the telephone fell from her hands. She had overheard the choleric conductor invoking the name of the Deity, and otherwise indulging in language not usual in Royal circles. Not more shocked were Sir Joseph Porter, K.C.B., and the gallant crew of H.M.S. Pinafore, when Captain Corcoran said "Damme!" The conductor himself was no less astonished to find what audience, fit, though few, had listened to his remarks. It is needless to add that from that day the rehearsals at the Monnaie have been marked by an embarrassing politeness.

Captious persons are wont to freely accuse musicians of envy, hatred, and malice towards each other; but what will they say when they read the following letter, which has been addressed by a sestett of distinguished French musicians to the Minister of Fine Arts concerning Glinka's opera, "Life for the Czar?"

"Monsieur le Ministre,—Les soussignés, membres de la section de composition musicale de l'Académie des Beaux-Arts de l'Institut de France, désireux de donner un témoignage de sympathie internationale et artistique à la Russie, dans la personne de Glinka, l'illustre fondateur de l'opéra russe, seraient heureux de voir représenter sur une scène française son œuvre capitale et populaire, la Vie pour le Tzar.

AMBROISE THOMAS, CH. GOUNOD, E. REYER,
C. SAINT-SAENS, J. MASSENET, LEO DELIBES."

Here, surely, is generosity and honour amongst—artists! But perhaps the said captious persons, whose existence is, we trust, purely imaginary in the present case, might reply that musicians can afford to be generous to a dead composer.

The well-known tenor, Herr Winkelmann, who was to have sung in "Parsifal" at the forthcoming Bayreuth Festival, has been taken ill. His part will be filled by Herren Jaeger and Van Dyk, who will appear alternately.

C. M. von Weber's posthumous opera "Die drei Pintos" is to be performed at Prague, Breslau, Bremen, and Coburg.

The new Lancaster Theatre now in course of erection in Shaftesbury Avenue will open with "As you Like It," produced by Miss Wallis. The cast, as at present, will be as follows:—Rosalind, Miss Wallis; Phœbe, Miss Kate Fayne; Audrey, Mrs. Edward Saker; Duke, Mr. J. R. Crauford; Frederick, Mr. Charles Arnold; Amiens, Mr. Seymour Jackson; Jaques de Bois, Mr. Harold Stafford; Le Beau, Mr. J. C. Buckstone; Charles the Wrestler, Mr. Arthur Fenwicke; Oliver, Mr. Charles Cooper; Jaques, Mr. Arthur Stirling; Orlando, Mr. Forbes Robertson; Adam, Mr. W. H. Stephens; Touchstone, Mr. W. Mackintosh; Corin, Mr. Allen Thomas; Silvius, Mr. Matthew Brodie; William, Mr. Sidney Harcourt; Lords, Messrs. Cathcart, Willats, &c. The scenery will be painted by Mr. H. Emden and Mr. W. Telbin. Looking at the above strong cast, a very interesting performance may be expected. By the way, Miss Wallis is to open the New Shakespeare Theatre at Liverpool, with productions of "As you Like It," and the "Taming of the Shrew."

The 23rd September is the probable date for the opening of the New Court Theatre, Sloane Square.

Miss Jessie Bartlett Davis, an American singer, has arranged with Mr. Vert for a concert tour in England.

It is also said that Mr. Vert will have the management of Mdme Marie Roze's tour this autumn.

A new opera house will be opened shortly in Chicago under the direction of Mr. Gye. Mdme Albani will appear in some favourite parts.

Last week we quoted from a letter in the Chicago Herald, in which the writer claimed to have been acquainted with Annie Laurie, and giving the origin of the song which bears her name. A correspondent of the American Musician, referring to the same letter in the Herald, says:—"The original of the song of 'Annie Laurie'—not less the sailor's than the soldier's song—are two verses found in a collection of Scottish songs, appended to the works of Robert Burns, from which many of his sweetest melodies were derived. The author was Mr. Douglas, of Fingland. These verses were written upon Annie, one of the four daughters, by his second wife, of Sir Robert Laurie, first baronet of Maxwelton. As Sir Robert was not created a baronet until 1685, this song may be ascribed to the latter part of the 17th century:

Maxwelton's banks are bonnie,
Where early fa's the dew;
Where me and Annie Laurie,
Made up the promise true,
Made up the promise true.
And ne'er forget will I!
And for bonnie Annie Laurie,
I'd lay me down and die!

The verse given above is almost literally the same as that of the present one. The second verse has been materially changed, but any one familiar with the melody would instantly recognise in it the germ which has been transplanted nearly two hundred years, and still lives.

A company has been registered under the title of Her Majesty's Theatre, Limited, with a capital of £125,000 in £5 shares. The object is to purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire certain lands, hereditaments, and buildings, known as Her Majesty's Theatre, and any addition or extension thereof, or any contents therein respectively, and all or any agreements affecting the same, or under which such property or properties can be acquired.

The Opera Comique re-opens on Monday, August 6th, under the direction of Mr. Daniel E. Bandmann, when he will produce his version of "The Strange Story of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde." About the same time Mr. Mansfield will open at the Lyceum with his Jekyll and Hyde Company.

the cheerless atmosphere of the nineteenth century, abiding the dawn of a better day, the virtues of generosity have not been brought to an uncomfortable perfection, as is shown by the battle now waging between Signor Sozogno, the proprietor of the Secolo, and Signor Ricordi, on a question of copyright. The first-named gentleman has, it appears, been publishing cheap editions of the operatic works of Cimarosa, Rossini, Donizetti, Meyerbeer, and others, relying on the provisions of the old copyright laws, which limited the period of an author's proprietary rights to thirty years. Meanwhile, however, a new law has been passed, which extends the period to eighty years, and on this ground Signor Ricordi claims rights in several of the works published by Sozogno, and has instituted proceedings against him. Not content with these measures, Ricordi is himself publishing the same works at a still cheaper rate, for as soon as Sozogno announces a work to be published at 25 centimes, Ricordi brings out the same publication at 15 centimes. This suicidal policy has resulted, however, in the publication by Sozogno of the same operas at the ridiculous price of 5 centimes. It is, of course, very sad to think how long the millennium is in coming to the musical world; but for all that, there will not be wanting unregenerate persons to wish that in England they might buy opera-scores for five centimes.

Miss Calhoun will produce in the autumn a new play specially written for her by Mr. R. L. Stevenson and another.

Shakespeare is likely to find a home shortly in more than one London theatre, as it is intended to produce, on a grand scale, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" at the Haymarket, after the run of "Captain Swift," which play is announced for September 1st, when Mr. Charles Brookfield will play the part of Marshall, the butler, and Mr. Fuller Mellish that of Harry Seabrook. Miss Norreys has also been offered a part by Mr. Beerbohm Tree.

An exceptionally attractive programme has been issued for the complimentary matinée benefit of Mr. W. W. Kelly, of the Princess's Theatre, on Thursday, August 9th.

Mr. Muller, the American Consul at Frankfort, is a tender-hearted man, who is so unconventional and free from the bonds of red-tape, that even in the columns of his trade reports he wages war against the slaughter of song birds in Germany. He says: "The indiscriminate slaughter of birds is one of the most crying evils of the day. If for no other reason than those dictated by æstheticism these little winged creatures have claims upon human protection. The appeal comes to men from all sides, and is made by birds of all varieties. Our song birds, those which once sang glad songs among the blossoms of spring and built their nest among our trees, delighting our little ones, are gone, or are fast going. It is only a question of time when the meadow lark, which sprang up in our path in the fields, trilling his notes of ravishing sweetness, delighting the ear long after the tired eye had lost power to follow him into the sky, shall share the robin's fate by disappearing from our fields and gardens." Mr. Muller has the full sympathy of the MUSICAL WORLD in his chivalrous crusade.

We record in another column the meeting of the Royal College of Music, at which the princely gift, by Mr. Samson Fox, of £30,000, was discussed and gratefully accepted. Nearly five months ago we commented upon this act of generosity (MUSICAL WORLD, Feb. 4, 1888), and we can add nothing to what we then said. Such noble bounty is best received in silence, since no words can adequately express its value or significance to the cause of art.

of an evening, in mid-Paris, in his rooms (au cinquième) in the quartier Bréda. Toot-toot, pang-pang—the whole neighbourhood was in an uproar at these unwonted sounds. Complaints were made, but Buisson continued to dispense harmony and insomnia with a turn of the wrist, and the Concierge, tired of the dispute, ended by refusing to deliver him up the key. Buisson, in his character of artist, brought his case into Court and gained it. The laws of France, severe on musicians, and which condemn hunting-horns to obscurity the whole year round, only permitting them to raise their brazen voices in the open air on Shrove Tuesday, one day in the 365; the laws of France, it seems, had not provided for the drum.

From the date of this victory, Buisson feared nothing. One Sunday morning I received a ticket; he was to perform in the afternoon at a grand concert at the Châtelet. The call of duty and friendship was imperative, so I went to hear him, nor without a presentiment of disaster.

A magnificent house, filled from floor to ceiling; our réclame had done its work! Suddenly the curtain rose, amidst intense silence and emotion. For my part I felt horror-stricken at the sight of Buisson all alone in the middle of the vast stage, where 600 ballet girls could have manœuvred in comfort—Buisson with his drum, in a short coat and gloves, looking like one of those queer insects which Granville represented clawing fantastic instruments. I saw him through my opera-glass waving his long arms as if unfolding his wings; he was evidently playing, the poor wretch, drumming and whistling with all his might. But no sound reached the auditorium, it was wasted in the desert air around the player; it was as if a fireside cricket were to chirp his serenade in the very middle of the Champ de Mars. And no opportunity of drawing attention to the holes, at such a distance, nor of saying: "It once happened," nor of referring to God's own nightingale!

I was crimson with shame, seeing amazement depicted on every face, and hearing murmurs of "What is the meaning of this stupid joke?" The doors of the boxes slammed, the house became gradually empty; but this public was too polite to hiss, and the drummer was allowed to conclude his piece in solitude. I waited behind with the idea of consoling him. But not at all! He believed he had had a grand success, and was more radiant than ever. "I am waiting for Colonne's signature," said he, showing me a paper ornamented with stamps. At this, however, I could no longer be silent. I took my courage in both hands, and gave vent in one outburst to all that was in my mind. "We have all been mistaken in expecting Paris to appreciate the charms of your big drum and the melody of your fife. I was mistaken, Gautier and David were mistaken, and indirectly you were mistaken. No, you are no nightingale."

"It happened to me," interrupted Buisson.

"Yes, it happened to you, I know, but you are not a nightingale. As for the nightingale, he sings everywhere, his song is of all countries, and in all countries his song is understood. You are nothing but a grasshopper, whose shrill, notorious refrain is suited to the olive-trees, the resinous pines, the clear atmosphere, the brilliant sunshine, the rocky hills of Provençe, but under this grey sky and in wind and rain an absurd and pitiful grasshopper with long bedraggled wings. Return then to your home, take back your drum, play your aubades and serenades, make the pretty girls dance the farandole, lead in triumphal march the victors of your village games. There you are a poet and an artist, while here you can be looked upon as nothing but a mountebank."

He answered nothing. but in his dreamy gaze, in his mild but obstinate expression, I could read, "You are jealous of me."

Some days after this our hero, proud as an Artaban, came to tell me that Colonne, just such another idiot as Hastein, had not been willing to come to terms, but that there was in view another, a glorious prospect, namely, an engagement to play at a café concert at 120 francs a night, already signed. Indeed, he had the contract with him. Aha! the fine document! I learnt its value afterwards Some unfortunate manager, whirling blindly down the turbid waters towards ruin, but imagined that he might cling to that fragile branch of willow—Buisson's musical efforts. Sure of never being able to pay, he had "signed" unhesitatingly. But Buisson did not see so far ahead, and rejoiced in his stamped paper. Moreover, as a café concert was in question, a costume was essential. "They have dressed me up as an ancient troubadour," said he, with a pleased smile, "but as I am very well proportioned, it is very becoming, you will see." And I did see.

In one of those café chantants so much in vogue during the last days of the Empire, with its tinsel decorations and crude colouring, made still more distressing to the eye by flaring gas-jets and chandeliers; its private boxes where great ladies had been known to conceal themselves to witness the contortions and grimaces of some "diva," its sea of heads seen through a mist of smoke, its waiters rushing about, its musical director, calm and dignified, rousing or quieting, with imperious gesture, the storm of a score of brass instruments, between a mawkish ditty, sung by a well favoured but sheepish looking girl, and a cayenne-pepper-ecloque, howled by a red-armed virago, there appeared suddenly, on the platform, in front of the dozen yawning and simpering females in full evening dress, who were awaiting their turn, a figure I shall never forget to my dying day. It was Buisson, the fife in his hand, the drum at his knee, in troubadour guise, as he had called it. But what a troubadour! A parti-coloured jerkin of apple green and blue, tight-fitting pantaloons—one red and the other yellow, a flaunting cap, pointed shoes, and those beautiful long, black moustaches, which he had not persuaded himself to shave, falling over his chin like a waterfall of blacking.

Delighted no doubt by the exquisite taste of this costume, the public received the musician with murmurs of approval, and my troubadour smiled complacently on beholding in front of him the sympathetic audience, and on feeling through his back the burning glances of the fair ladies seated admiringly round. To be sure, matters were different when his performance had begun, the toot-toots and pang-pangs were powerless to charm ears whose delicacy had been betrayed (as the palate may be by alcohol) by the strong flavour of the usual repertoire of the establishment. And then this was no aristocratic and forbearing audience like that at the Châtelet. "Enough, enough!" "Turn him out!" "That will do, learned pig." Vain was Buisson's attempt to open his mouth, to say "It once happened to me." Everyone rose from his seat, the curtain had to be dropped, and the motley troubadour disappeared in a storm of hisses, like a poor ruffled parrot caught in a tropical whirlwind.

Would you believe it? Buisson persevered! Illusions grow apace, and take long to uproot from the Provençal brain. For a fortnight he reappeared nightly, always hissed, never paid, until the day came when an official fixed a notice of bankruptcy to the doors.

Then came the downfall and collapse. Our drummer, always believing in his success, always pursuing his chimerical contracts, went from bad to worse, until he reached the lowest depths of the suburban tea-gardens.

One evening, winter being scarcely over, and spring not yet arrived, I was crossing the Champs Elysées. A concert was in full swing and lanterns were being hung to the bare trees in front of a kiosk. A melancholy drizzling rain was falling. I heard a toot-toot, pang-pang—there he was again! I caught sight of him through an opening, drumming a measure of Provençe before an audience of half-a-dozen—members of the free list, I should imagine—huddled under their umbrellas. I did not venture nearer; I and my imprudent enthusiasm had been to blame. Poor Buisson! Poor bedraggled wings!

THE END.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The fifth annual general meeting of the corporation of the Royal College of Music was held on the 24th inst., at the College, Kensington-gore. Prince Christian occupied the chair. and amongst those present were the Duke of Wesminster, Lord Aberdare, Lord Thring, Lord Tyneham, Sir G. Grove, the Right Hon. A. J. Mundella, M.P., Sir P. C. Owen, Lord C. Bruce, Sir J. Stainer, Sir W. Gilstrap, Sir F. Cort, Mr. Samson Fox, Mr. W. G. Cusins. Mr. C. Morley, the hon. secretary, read the report of the council, which stated that the number of scholars on the books at the end of April was 59, and the number of paying students 170. The examiners who conducted the fifth annual examinaton stated in their report that the work done at the college during the past year had on the whole impressed them very favourably, and they expressed their opinion that as an educational establishment the college cannot but have a powerful influence on the condition of musical art in this country. At the commencement of the year the council were enabled to throw open eight scholarships to public competition. The total number of qualified candidates was 243, who were examined at 38 centres; 69 were sent up for final competition at the college. The council had the gratification of reporting that there was every prospect that the inconveniences arising from insufficient accommodation in the college will be shortly removed, Mr. Samson Fox, of Leeds, having offered a munificent gift of £30,000 for a new collegiate building on an appropriate site, to be determined by her Majesty's Commissioners of 1851, who had granted a site for the new building on the South Kensington Estate in Princes Gate. The balance in hand in the revenue account, after deducting liabilities, amounted to £2,483, which showed an increase during the year £469.

The chairman, in moving the adoption of the report and a vote of thanks to Mr. Samson Fox for his munificent gift, congratulated the meeting on the flourishing state of the college When the new building was erected they hoped to get a great many more pupils. The expenditure would necessarily be increased, and they trusted that the subscriptions would increase to enable them to meet it.

Mr. Mundella, in seconding the motion, said the report was of an encouraging nature from whatever point of view they regarded it. He was sure they would like him to say a word or two in acknowledgment of Mr. Samson Fox's munificent gift. Mr. Fox was a man of the people, who had raised himself to his present position by his great talent as an inventor, and he was now making his offer in order that the nation might enjoy the advantages and the pleasure which he had himself derived from the cultivation of music. And not only were they to have a new and handsome college for the accommodation of 400 students, but they were to be allowed to retain the existing building. The resolution was then put and carried, and on the motion of the Duke of Westminster, seconded by Lord Aberdare, the Council was reappointed, with the exception of Earl Spencer and Mr. Slagg, who had signified there wish to retire, and in whose places Mr. Samson Fox and Mr. Joseph Baring were appointed. Lord Thring moved a vote of thanks to Prince Christian for presiding. Mr. Samson Fox, who was much cheered on rising to second the motion, said from his youth he loved music, and always gravitated where he could find the best music. From his great success in connection with his business he set himself on a certain day to consider in what way he could do some little thing in return, and he determined to do it in the direction of promoting the cultivation of music, because by the cultivation of music the poorest child in the land might give pleasure to thousands and thousands of people. Then, in looking to the working of this college, he found that it had been so well managed that he thought he could not do better than give it such a sum as would enable it steadfastly to continue its work. (Applause.) The motion was passed unanimously, and Prince Christian briefly returned thanks. Miss Marian P. Osborn was then presented with the Hopkinson Gold Medal, awarded to the best performer on the pianoforte at the college; and Miss Margaret Jenkins was called up and congratulated by the chairman on having been awarded the piano offered by Messrs. Brinsmead at the Midsummer Exhibition. The meeting then separated.—The Daily News.

WAGNER IN ENGLAND.

"After the first rehearsal the directors of the Philharmonic were so delighted and full of hope that they insisted upon my performing some of my compositions at the very next concert. I had to yield, and chose the pieces from 'Lohengrin.' . . . The orchestra, which has taken a great liking to me, is very efficient, and possesses great skill and fairly quick intelligence, but it is quite spoilt as regards expression; there is no piano, no nuance. It was astonished and delighted at my way of things. With two further rehearsals I hope to put it tole in order. But then this hope and my intercourse with orchestra are all that attract me here; beyond this, indifferent and disgusting to me. The public, however, distinguished me very much, both in receiving me and more at the close. Curious to me was the confession of Mendelssohnians that they had never heard and understoo overture to the 'Hebrides' as well as under my direction."

. The first Philharmonic Concert took place on March
On the next day the daily papers came out with a pe shower of abuse, which was echoed in the weeklies, notab the Athenæum, and continued without abatement during entire stay of Wagner in London. M. Sainton relates th the next rehearsal, when Wagner entered the orchestra, hand was raised to welcome him, the musicians receiving with absolute silence. He himself attributes this chang attitude to the influence of the Press, while Wagner disco in it the influence of Costa, "the real master and despot of musicians, who can dismiss and appoint them according to will." Probably both were right. Wagner, although, we h seen, a true and warm-hearted friend, was little conciliator his manner to strangers, and the asperities of which Ber speaks naturally roused the indignation of those who cam casual contact with them. He was well known to be admirer of Italian opera, and the Italian faction, with Cost their head, naturally hated him. What was worse, he written a very ill-judged pamphlet against the Jews, in wh Mendelssohn and Meyerbeer were severely criticised, altho by no means vulgarly abused. Meyerbeer's influence in Press was far-reaching, and Mendelssohn was at the time idol of the English public. We have been informed on best authority that Wagner, when he had to conduct a worl
Mendelssohn, deliberately and slowly put on a pair of w kid gloves, to indicate the formal, or one may say fashiona character of the music, and this piece of bad taste natur roused the ire of Mendelssohn's admirers, in the Press elsewhere. As is usual in such cases, both sides were to bl
But at the same time it remains a matter for regret that influence which a man of Wagner's genius and high art aims might have had on English music, was thus almost lite
"snuffed out by an article." Altogether, Wagner's day
London were amongst the unhappiest of his eventful ca
but it is interesting to observe how, even in such circumsta he was able to forget external troubles over a subject that laid hold of his mind. The instrumentation of "The Walk was for the greater part finished at Portland Terrace, and masterly exposition of Buddhism as distinguished from asceticism of Dante's "Divina Commedia," already referre is dated from London.

We are assured by Mr. W. G. Cusins, Master of the Qu music, and for a number of years conductor of the Philharn Society, that in spite of the attacks of the Press, the Phi monic season of 1855 was in a pecuniary sense an extre successful one. The public were eager to see the man excited such ire in celestial bosoms, and many of those came to scoff remained to admire. There were at any rat very distinguished persons who treated Wagner with a ness which almost moved him to tears.

'You have probably heard," he writes to Liszt ' charmingly Queen Victoria behaved to me. She attend eventh concert with Prince Albert, and as they wanted t something of mine, I had the 'Tannhäuser' overture rep which helped me to a little external amende. I really seem have pleased the Queen. In a conversation I had with h her desire, after the first part of the concert, she was s that I was really quite touched. These two were the first in England who dared to speak in my favour openly and guisedly, and if you consider that they had to deal w political outlaw, charged with high treason and 'wanted' police, you will think it natural that I am sincerely grate both."

In a letter addressed to M. Sainton, he says:—

Si je pouvais effacer quelque chose de ma conduite passée, ce seraient ces plaintes et temoignages de mécontentement que je t'ai donnés tant de fois à entendre, en récompense de ta meilleure volonté, et, surtout, des chagrins et des désagréments assez affligeants, que tu devais essuyer alors toi-même, à cause de moi. . . . Te voilà maintenant payé comme tu le méritais. Et qu'est ce que tu as gagné en échange de ce que tu as perdu ? Hélas ! un triste don, mon amitié, et le souvenir d'un homme mélancolique, fort souvent insupportable qui mangeais tes dîners et attaquais ta meilleure humeur par son français horrible ! Voilà ta récompense ! Et moi ? ne devrais-je pas être mortifié par l'idée de t'avoir attirée tout cela sans te pouvoir réstituer la moindre part de ce que tu as perdu à cause de moi ? Tout ce qui me console un peu, c'est la leçon que tu as reçue, et qui t'aura appris de ne t'occuper jamais, quant à l'art, que des hommes d'une trompe bien différente de la mienne. Mais comme je suis le plus âgé je te donne encore un conseil un peu grec.

' Ton tout dévoué frère et ami,

' RICHARD WAGNER.'

A second letter, addressed to M. Sainton, and also published here for the first time, is dated Bayreuth, 1875. At that time Wagner was in the zenith of his fame, and just preparing a performance of his " Nibelungen-Ring " at the Bayreuth Theatre, erected for him by the liberality of his admirers, and of the King of Bavaria. But he had not forgotten his old London friends, and a letter from M. Sainton, which reached him in the middle of his excitement, immediately elicited the following reply:—

" MON CHER SAINTON,—Tu n'avais pas besoin de me rappeler ton souvenir. J'ai dicté à ma femme ma vie entière ; elle la voulait savoir au fond. Cela est écrit, et sera legué à mon fils, pour le faire paraître après ma mort. Et quoi ? Vous vous figurez de ne pas figurer dans cette vie ? Diable ! No. 8, Hind Street. Et Lüders? Tout votre histoire à vous deux est déposée dans ce manuscrit, depuis Helsingfors jusqu'à Toulouse (en passant Hambourg). Et puis Londres ?—Charlemagne ? Où as-tu le sens, mon cher ?

" Eh bien ! Rappelle-toi bientôt à ce qu'existe encore un certain chef-d'orchestre de l'ancienne Philharmonic (pensionné ?) à Beyreuth (en Bavière, non Syrie !).

" Prends un beau jour ta chère femme, charge Lüders sur tes épaules, monte un bon cab à l'heure, et arrive à juste temps à Wahnfried ; à une heure nous dinons (! !) souper à sept heures du soir.

" Et maintenant, trèva aux Lohengrins à Londres ç'a m'a. Costa—mais si tu veux, apporte ton violon avec toi. Les Nibelungen feront les honneurs a vous tons.

" Bayreuth, 4 Juin, 1875."

Wagner again visited London in 1877, when he conducted some concerts at the Albert Hall, and was received by the public—as was his friend Liszt nine years later—with every sign of enthusiasm. By special command he went to Windsor, and had an audience of the Queen, and it would be interesting to know what reminiscences these two interesting persons exchanged with each other.

Correspondence.

To the Editor of the MUSICAL WORLD.

SIR,—In your extract from the new number of the Quarterly, I find that " at a meeting of the directors " . . . (of the Philharmonic Society, convened for the election of a new conductor) . . . " Mr. Sainton . . . rose to his feet and named Wagner," although " he himself had no personal cognisance of Wagner's capacities; neither had any of the other directors; but, as Mr. Sainton remarked, a man who had been so much abused must have something in him. This sentiment was received with acclamation, and it was unanimously resolved that a leap in the dark should be made." On the strength of its being a matter of historical interest, I would venture to supply the key to this otherwise too emotional version of the proceedings of the conscientious directors of the society in question. Mr. Sainton had a dear old friend, Charles Lüders, an excellent musician, albeit of the so-called old school; and I had the good fortune to be intimate with both. To these friends I had suggested Wagner, of whom neither knew even the existence. Myself, I had already, in 1845, foreshadowed the future greatness of Richard Wagner when reviewing the performance of " Rienzi," at Dresden, in the then existing English Gentleman : knowing also his remarkable gift as a conductor. When the directors heard that I had proposed to Sainton to name Wagner, I was invited to attend their meeting, where I gave all the information they required. This must have been most satisfactory to them, for I received the voted thanks and enjoyed the honour of a " shake hands all round." The first correspondence concerning this matter was between Wagner and myself, and the master's original letters are now in possession of the Earl of Dysart, the enthusiastic President of the London Wagner Society. These will appear with many others in " Wagner as I Knew Him," which I have written at the request of Lord Dysart, and which will be ultimately published in English, French, and German.—I am, Sir, yours obediently,

FERDINAND PRAEGER.

To the Editor of THE MUSICAL WORLD.

SIR,—Can you, or any of your readers, inform me whether the law of copyright extends to foreign music published for the first time in England ? I have asked lawyers, who seem undecided, or perhaps do not know, not being versed in this particular branch of law. It is an important point, which many would like to have cleared up.—Yours faithfully,

W. NICHOLSON.

Warter Vicarage, York.

To the Editor of THE MUSICAL WORLD.

DEAR SIR,—While thanking Mr. Harris for the fine performances he has given us this season, I must object to one alteration most strongly. He has entirely destroyed the dramatic effect of the Cathedral scene in " Faust," by giving it before the Soldiers' Chorus, instead of in its true place, after the death of Valentine. My dislike at seeing this great operatic drama so spoilt is my reason for protesting.—Yours truly, telegraphed his inability to be present. Dr. C. J. Frost distributed in a very kindly manner the diplomas gained. In his address Dr. Frost alluded to his own early examination at the college in graceful terms, Mr. C. E. Stephens, who was present being one of the examiners, and spoke of the growth of the work, which had reached upon the present occasion some 185 candidates. Dr. Frost gave words of kind and judicious encouragement to the unsuccessful, who were to regard themselves as proceeding towards success by their present efforts. Mr. C. E. Stephens gave evidence regarding the growth of the College examinations, and he pointed out the importance of securing diplomas granted by acknowledged systems of examinations in which the high standards had been unflinchingly maintained. Mr. James Higgs gave sensible advice to candidates, urging them to take care to present good work all round, and in every department of the examination, as the only means of attaining reliable success. Mr. James Turpin called attention to the gratifying increase of good work and the corresponding increase in the percentage of passes. The company present included a number of distinguished musical people and lady friends. The A. C. O. Diploma presentation was fixed for July 27th, at 11, Dr. G. Garratt, M.A., of Cambridge, having kindly consented to preside on that occasion.

W. W. LINTON.

SOME RECOLLECTIONS OF GERMANY.

By R. B. Daniell.

To the musician there can hardly be a more interesting country than Germany. The land which has produced so many musical geniuses must always be dear to us. The mere mention of Germany suggests ideas of great composers, of contrapuntists, theorists, and acousticians, of organists and pianists, Kapellmeisters and conductors, and of grand old organs. Even untravelled men know something of the historical old towns, the natural forests and romantic scenery, the quaintly dressed village people, and the legendary lore of Germany. The Germans may be briefly described as a highly-gifted, persevering, and studious race; and if war and its concomitant grinding taxation could be laid aside for ever, theirs would, I believe, be a country of happiness and prosperity. The land of Copernicus and Kepler, of Schiller and Goëthe, of Handel, Bach, and Beethoven, is, in short, the land of genius and intellect, in which so many of the brightest stars that will for ever illumine the literary and artistic firmament, first appeared. And if the noble array of her poets, musicians, astronomers, philosophers, theologians, historians, chemists, grammarians, and philologists has rendered Germany worthy of the admiration of the world, her tremendous armies, led by military geniuses of the first order, enforce general respect. Nor ought I, who am a professed admirer of that country, to omit to pay my slight tribute of respect to the memory of the truly great and Christian Emperors who have so lately been removed by death: mighty Emperors who are mourned even by their enemies.

If the first real progress in counterpoint and the canon was made by the Netherlanders; if favoured Italy, possessed of a Pope's Chapel and the finest choir in the world, encouraged the Netherlanders and perfected the chorus a cappella; if to her we owe the madrigal and the finest masses without accompaniment, and the beginning of oratorio and opera, and many important instrumental forms; if, thanks to the genius and work of such men as Carrissimi and the elder Scarlatti, great progress was early made in that country; if France deserves our gratitude for her encouragement of opera and the countenance she showed to the immortal Gluck; if we ourselves invented the anthem and glee, and Englishmen early cultivated writing for keyed instruments, and attained a wonderful degree of skill in playing on them, and produced excellent madrigals; if as early as the time of Corelli, we find our Purcell writing beautiful suites and sonatas, and this great genius excelled in all the styles; if, above all, we have fostered Art, and especially Oratorio (the highest of all musical forms), by the countenance we have shown to so many of the greatest composers, who wrote some of their finest works for us, we must not forget that to Germany we owe, in their perfection, the chorale, the Passion music, the oratorio, the romantic opera, the mass with instrumental accompaniments, the majestic organ fugue, and (if I may include the productions of the great Viennese school) the sonata, the string quartett, and the symphony. Nor ought our obligations to the German organ-builders to be forgotten.

Many years ago I had the good fortune to sojourn for a time in Germany, principally at Stuttgart, and I saw something of German musical arrangements. Of the organs I shall say little, and of the conservatoires nothing. A sufficient knowledge of the German organ may be picked out of Dr. Hopkins's work, and of the conservatoires I know nothing except from hearsay.

In Germany operas are given in the German language, so that Addison's satire could not be pointed at the audiences of that country. "We," he says in his account of Italian Opera in England, "no longer understand the language of our own stage; insomuch that I have often been afraid, when I have seen our Italian performers chattering in the vehemence of action, that they have been calling us names, and abusing us among themselves; but I hope, since we do put such an entire confidence in them, they will not talk against us before our faces, though they may do it with the same safety as if it were behind our backs." The stage is held in high reputation in Germany, and is regarded as a means of educating the people. It is not uncommon for noblemen to appear on the boards. At Stuttgart the theatre is close to the Royal Palace, with which it is connected by a covered way. About two plays, and perhaps three or four operas were given weekly. Shakespeare's plays were much esteemed. Once a year, during the hot season, the theatre was closed. The orchestra numbered some seventy first-rate instrumentalists. Once (in Jomelli's time) opera at Stuttgart was the best in Europe. The audience are very critical, and I once knew them hiss without mercy a Sarastro who was not quite equal to the part. I have seen them equally demonstrative when pleased. I shall never forget the reception this Sarastro's rendering of the great air, "In diesen heiligen Hallen" met with. The artist had been brought from a very considerable distance, and, poor fellow, his sufferings must have been terrible. It was most painful to see him meekly bowing to the audience. It was my happiness sometimes to visit the opera with the eminent composer, the late H. H. Pierson, who was then living at Stuttgart, and enjoy the critical and very instructive remarks he would make from time to time. Among the operas most in favour at Stuttgart were:—Stumme von Portici (Masaniello), Fidelio, Norma, Nachtwandlerin (Sonnambula), Weisse Dame (Dame Blanche), Don Juan (Don Giovanni), Figaros Hochzeit (Nozze di Figaro), Die Zauberflöte (Magic Flute), Barbier von Sevilla, Freichütz, Puritani, Kreutzer's Nachtlager von Granada, Mehul's Joseph, Gounod's Faust, Mignon, Halevy's Jüdin (La Juive), Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor, Lortzing's Czar und Zimmermann, and Wagner's Fliegende Holländer. The first opera I saw at Stuttgart was the Zauberflöte, which was given on the king's birthday, and honoured by the presence of his Majesty. Beethoven, I believe, considered the Zauberflöte to be Mozart's masterpiece. I say nothing of the libretto; but the music, from the great overture to the end of the opera, is almost supernaturally beautiful. It was written in the last year of Mozart's short life. After studying the score and hearing this opera repeatedly, one asks if, in spite of all the efforts of reformers and much talk about musical æsthetics, any real progress has been made in musical form and instrumentation in opera since the composition of the "dear, old, and yet ever youthful Zauberflöte." Early hours were kept at the theatre, which was, as a rule, closed by half-past nine. The theatre has a parterre, or pit, and four galleries. The highest charge for entrance was three shillings (the price of admission to the "strangers' box" which is in the first gallery); fourpence admitted to a side seat in the fourth gallery. A reserved seat in the pit or the second gallery cost two shillings. The concerts, it need hardly be said, were excellent. They were given in the fine room in the Königsbau. A programme of one that I heard on February 20, 1872, lies before me. It was given "for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the members of the Royal Court Chapel and the Royal Court Stage." The concert began at seven and ended at nine. At the end of the bill "honoured visitors who arrive after the concert has begun, are respectfully writer. Stuttgart is noted for its fine modern pianofortes. Old square pianofortes were let out on hire at a very cheap rate to students. I think the charge for tuning one of these instruments was a shilling.

At Stuttgart, and I believe in Germany generally, the climate is extreme. The heat in summer is very great, and in winter the cold is intense, though very bracing. The town lies in a valley, nearly surrounded by slopes, covered with vineyards, beyond which is forest. The forests afford the most delightful rambles. In winter, when the ground is covered with frozen snow, and the pines gleam like silver in the light of a full moon, a night walk in the forest is magnificent. In the season a true "Nightingale's Chorus" may be heard in the same forests. On the side of Stuttgart which is not surrounded by the forest, and near at hand, is Cannstadt on the "Haunted Neckar." Stuttgart possesses an Art gallery and Museum, one of the largest public libraries in the world; a Royal park, with copies of the finest statuary, and its Bahnhof, or station, was said to be the most complete in Europe. The people are very good-natured and kind to the English.

RECITAL NEWS.

POTTSVILLE, U.S.—The formal re-opening of Trinity Church, Pottsville, since its extensive decoration, was made the occasion of a musical demonstration, the memorable part of which consisted in an exhibition of a costly and elaborate organ, presented by Mr. F. G. Yuengling. There were addresses of presentation and reception, followed by a prayer of consecration. Three organists of local celebrity, Professors Kellar, Becker, and Sinclair played. The vested choir from the cathedral took part in the choral numbers. The chief numbers of the programme were:—Cantate in D, Dr. Elvey; an Offertoire, by Wely; Anthem, "God came from Temen," by Dr. Steggall; "Send out Thy Light, by Gounod; "O Thou that tellest"—Messiah; and Canon Woodward's "The radiant morn hath passed away." The list of organ music has not come to hand.

The choir of St. Luke's, Brompton Hospital, after evening service, lately, presented to their organist and choir master, Mr. F. Gilbert Webb, a handsomely silver mounted ebony bâton, with an illuminated address, as a token of their esteem and value of his services, and of their hearty good wishes on the occasion of his marriage, which was celebrated in the Chapel Royal, Savoy.

ALL HALLOWS, LOMBARD STREET, CITY.—Organ recitals given by Mr. F. E. Hillman, on July 18th and 22nd:—Concerto in F (Handel); Adagio cantabile (Gear); "Ex resurrexit," Mass in C (Beethoven); Andante in G minor (Silas); Postlude in E flat (Salaman); March in G (Bonheur); Andante in A flat (Bennett); Andante Grazioso, No. 5 (Smart); "Fac ut Portem" (Rossini); Credo, Mass in B flat (Farmer).

CHURCH OF ST. NICHOLAS COLE-ABBEY.—On July 17th, 1888, Mr. H. W. Weston, F.C O., gave a recital. Vocalist, Miss Tunnicliffe. Prelude and Fugue in C minor (Bach); Theme and Variations in G major (Rheinberger), 10th Organ Sonata; Air, "O Lord have mercy" (Pergolesi); Overture in G major, 1696-1755 (Greene); "La Meditation" (Thayer); Air, "O rest in the Lord," "Elijah" (Mendelssohn); Scherzo Symphonique in C major (Guilmant).

ASHBY-DE-LA-ZOUCH.—Programme of an Organ Recital given by Mr. G. F. McCleary, A.C.O., at Holy Trinity Church, on July 10: "Marche Religieuse" (Guilmant); Air with Variations and Finale Fugats (Smart); Cantilène Pastorale (Guilmant); Fugue in E minor (J. S. Bach); Intermezzo (Macbeth); "Marche Moderne" (E. H. Lemare).

MORAVIAN CHURCH, BEDFORD.—Programme of Organ Recitals given by Mr. Henry R. Rose, A.R.A.M., Professor in the Royal Academy of Music, Organist of St. Pancras Church, on July 19. Vocalist: Madame Clara Samuell (Mrs. H. R. Rose). Morning Recital: Sonata in F minor, No. 1 (Mendelssohn); Adagio in E major (Gustav Merkel); Prelude and Fugue in A minor (J. S. Bach); Chorale with Variations (Henry Smart); Andante in G minor (E. Cuthbert Nunn); Organ Concerto, No. 6 (Handel); Allegro Cantabile (Widor); Grand Chœur en ré majeur (Guilmant). Evening Recital: Prelude and Fugue in E flat (Bach); Larghetto from Clarionet Quintett (Mozart); Concerto in B flat, No. 2 (Handel); Andante (Henry Smart); Adagio from 3rd Symphony (Mendelssohn); Air (Handel); Pastorale from Organ Sonata (Guilmant); Gavotte in D (J. S. Bach); Allegro Cantabile (Widor); Postlude in C (Henry Smart). Mr. Rose played in a truly masterly manner. The organ was built in 1715 by Gerhard Schmidt, nephew of Bernhard Schmidt, "the father of English Organ-builders." It has undergone an entire rebuild by Messrs Brindley & Foster, of Sheffield, on their improved tubular pneumatic system. The scheme has already been given.

TRINITY CHURCH, S. MARYLEBONE.—Organ recitals on behalf of the organ fund. Programme for July 19th:—Offertoire in C (Tours); Tenor Melody (Smart); Minuetto (G. B. Calkin); Sonata in C minor (Mendelssohn); Prayer (Lemmens); Postlude on "Jerusalem the Golden" (Dr. C. J. Frost); Offertoire in A (Wely). At the organ, Mr. E. F. Barker, A.C.O.

PARISH CHURCH, HIGH WYCOMBE.—Organ recital by Mr. J. G. Wrigley, Mus. Bac., Oxon., F.C.O., on July 23rd. Programme:—Prelude and Fugue in D minor, No. 3 (Mendelssohn); Allegro Cantabile in F minor (Widor); "The Maid of Judah" (Kucken); Marcia Religioso (Perelli); Menuetto and Allegro in B flat (Handel); Serenade (Gounod); Minuet and Trio (Boccherini); March (Rossini.)

MAIDSTONE.—Services were recently held in St. Paul's, Church, Maidstone, to celebrate the opening of the organ, which has lately been renovated and enlarged. At the conclusion of the services recitals were given on the organ by Mr. Wilson Parish, A.C.O. The programmes were well chosen to bring out all the points in the organ, and were well sustained. The organ is of no great size, having only two manuals; but its quality is exceptionally good, and now that, in accordance with Mr. Willis's wish at the time of its construction, it has been brought well out into the church, it is well heard throughout the building. The action had in the course of 27 years become considerably worn, but has now been entirely replaced by Mr. George Adams, of Brixton, who has added a violoncello stop to the pedal organ. The quickness of repetition of which the pneumatic action is capable, was well illustrated during the two recitals. The rendering at each service of Gounod's anthem, "Sing praises unto the Lord," showed that in his capacity as choirmaster the young organist has profited by his own training as a member of the Westminster Abbey Choir. The following were the programmes:—Afternoon—Fugue in G minor (J. S. Bach); Serenata in E minor (Th. Kullak); No. 1, Four Sketches for the Pedal Piano (R. Schumann); (a), Andante con motto (from Sonata in G); (b), Allegro Moderato (E. Silas); Sonata V (Mendelssohn); March in D (W. T. Best). Evening—Fugue in D minor, commonly called "The Giant Fugue" (J. S. Bach); (a), March upon a theme of Handel; (b), Souvenir (Alex. Guilmant); Sonata II (Mendelssohn); March in C (Lefebure-Wely); Minuet and Trio (Sterndale Bennett); "Halielujah Chorus" (Handel).

Notes.

The fine church of Saint Siffrein, Carpentras, has just had a new chancel organ, built by Messrs. Merklin and Co The instrument, an excellent specimen of the builder's art, was opened lately by M. Louis Bonnet, who showed off the various stops to advantage. The recital was interpersed with solos by M. Chauvrean and others. An interesting little report of some 16 pages has recently been published by Watelet, entitled "The chancel organ in the church of Saint Clotilde, Paris, constructed on the new electro-pneumatic system of Schmoeie and Mols, by Messrs. Merklin and Co." This is the account of the commission appointed to examine the organ, and has been very ably compiled.

In the list of monopolies granted during the time of Charles the First, between 1632-35, occur the following: "One to George Latham, and two others for the sole printing of set songs, etc.; one to a preacher and schoolmaster, William Brathwaite, for the sole right to publish music books; and another to George Sandy's, son of the Archbishop of York, for the exclusive copyright of his translation of the psalter."

A new organ has been placed in Kidlington Parish Church, Oxford. It was built by Henry Willis and Sons, of London. At the opening service last week Canon Paget of Christ Church, Oxford, preached.

A thoughtful author has the following:—"Never is piety more unwise than when she casts beauty out of the church, and by this excommunication forces her fairest sister to become profane. It is the duty of religion, not to eject, but to cherish and seek fellowship with every beautiful exhibition which delights, and every delicate art which embellishes, human life. So, on the other hand, it is the duty of Art not to waste its high capabilities in the imitation of what is trivial, and in the curious adornment of what has only a finite significance. The highest art is always the most religious; and the greatest artist is always a devout man. A scoffing Raphael or Michael Angelo is not conceivable."

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS' CALENDAR.

Tuesday, July 31st, the Library will be opened from 7 to 8.30. July 31st, Meeting of Committee of Organists' Benevolent Society at 7.30, Council Meeting at 8, to be followed at 8.30 by Annual General Meeting at the College. The reports will be read at this meeting, but owing to the late dates of the examinations the accounts will not be audited in time. The meeting may have to be adjourned as a matter of form. Further arrangements will be duly announced.

MUSIC IN ARCADIA.

By a late Arcadian.

Nobody supposes that the lot of a musical critic is one of entirely unalloyed delight. Even the most innocent outsider, to whom a distinguished critic is a very fearful wild fowl indeed, can understand that forty concerts in a week, though they be composed of Beethoven's or Signor Denza's music, are apt to produce a feeling of something like satiety in the writer whose duty it is to attend them. Indeed, so unhappy is his lot, that when I find time to write my proposed supplement to the Paradiso, I intend to add a special circle for musical critics. Every critic who has performed his duties conscientiously will find place there; and his greatest reward for a life-time of concerts will be that he shall there have to listen to no music whatever. There shall be no screaming octogenarian divas, and the strains of "Un di si ben," shall not be heard at all; nor shall he ever have to go to matinées. No drawing-room music shall be there; and, oh, ter quaterque beate, the amateur young lady, the terror that squawketh by night, shall never bid a wildly hypothetical lover

Take thy lips from me, love!

All these things shall be passed away; and I fear me much that those critics for whom the celestial choirs themselves shall be hushed, would not heed even the voice of the garland-weaving Matelda.

But this vision is as yet unrealised, and remains among the things to be awaited. And, meanwhile, the lot of the critic is hard. There are, of course, degrees of hardness; but the hardest lot of all is that of the critic in the provincial town. I do not refer to the larger cities, where the musical standard is, perhaps, as high as in the metropolis, but rather to the average country town. And—with no ulterior views of a subscription on his behalf—I propose to set forth an unvarnished statement of the grievous case of the critic who dwells in the modern Arcadia.

I have been in Arcadia in that capacity, and know something of it. It has often been matter of conjecture with me whether, in the good old days wherein Strephon and Chloe went a-Maying, and Strephon piped unto the damsel on an oaten pipe, there were musical critics. Certainly, there was small need for analytical programmes, because the music to be got out of an oaten pipe is, after all, limited in scope. The conditions, too, have changed a good deal; Arcadia is not what it used to be, the land of unconscious, untrammelled art; and it is hard to think of Dr. Richter, in bucolic raiment, and decked out with daffodils, leading his band upon the village green.

No; the conditions to-day are very different. Let us take the case of any country town, say of 50,000 inhabitants. There will be, perhaps, half-a-dozen newspapers, whose editors are on friendly terms with the leading inhabitants, on whose support they are, to a certain extent, dependent. Each of these papers will have a staff of from two to eight or nine reporters, whose duties embrace, somewhat comprehensively, the writing criticisms of picture galleries, theatres, and concerts, beside the ordinary routine of political meetings, inquests, weddings, and such like cheerful things. Add to these a small knot of musical amateurs; a large number of professors of the same art; a general society composed of two sharply-defined sections—first, extremely respectable people, whose greatest pride is that they never had any connection with trade; and secondly (these forming the mass of the population), the people who are occupied in the necessary, if disgusting, process of earning a livelihood in business of some sort, and you have a rough sketch of the conditions under which a provincial critic has to work.

Let me recount the details of an average musical season in the country, such as I myself have known. Of course this does not correspond with the London season, beginning as it does about October, and continuing till Lent. The first warning one gets of the beginning is a sudden eruption of advertisements, stating, in the usual way, that Mr. Gubbins, R.A.M., has the honour to announce that his Ladies' Philharmonic Society will give a concert on a certain date, when the said damsels, more or less accomplished—generally less—will perform, amongst other things, the overture to "Tannhaüser" and "Silvery Waves," scored for orchestra by the redoubtable Gubbins. The combination strikes one as a little—well, call it eclectic—and I turn to the back of the programme, where the names of the performers, and their respective instruments, are set forth in much detail. I find that the band consists of four first violins, thirteen seconds, one viola, two 'cellos, one piccolo, two concertinas, one triangle, drum, and piano. Now, this curiously balanced orchestra may, no doubt, cope with the difficulties of "Silvery waves," but, recollecting certain passages for the brass in "Tannhaüser," I am a little doubtful. Moreover, I am very certain that the audience would infinitely prefer the "Virgin's Prayer" to Wagner; but I learn, on inquiry, that the parents of the young ladies like them to go in for High Art; it looks so well on the programme, and then, you know, anyone could play the "Virgin's Prayer," but it is not just anyone who can play Wagner; which is very true, and there's the rub. Picture it, Dr. Richter, the wind in "Tannhaüser" represented by two concertinas and a piccolo! How it is to be done I do not know, though I think the piccolo plays as much of the first violin music as possible, and the concertinas come in where they can in the piano score.

Here, then, is trouble at starting. I have not only got to attend that concert, which is in itself bad enough, but I have to write a criticism on it. The conductor is a personal friend of mine; I know many of the performers; and, above all, the concert has been well advertised in my paper, so that my chief says, on the night before the concert, "We must give Mr. Gubbins a good notice"—meaning, to be candid, a puff proportional to the value of his advertisement. Therefore, if I tell the truth, and condemn the performance as a piece of hideous vulgarity, I shall have to face the wrath of my friend the conductor; the scorn of all the ladies in the orchestra, and their relations, who are many; besides incurring my chief's censure for offending a man who advertises largely. Further, I have the assured knowledge that my fellow critics will not view the matter in the same light; but will, on the contrary, write of the performance in enthusiastic terms. By what evasions and circumlocutions am I to satisfy my conscience and the conductor?

THE WAGNER FESTIVAL.

A very large audience, including a large sprinkling of English and American pilgrims, assembled in the Wagner Theatre, at Bayreuth, on Sunday last to witness the opening performance of "Parsifal." No little interest attached to the appearance of Mdme. Wagner for the first time in public since her husband's death. Beyond the bare facts contained in the telegram from our Bayreuth correspondent, we have no room for further details this week, and must hold over a fuller account till a subsequent number.

THE "ELIJAH" AT BOLOGNA.

From Our Special Correspondent.

On the evening of the 2nd of July an audience of over two thousand persons assembled in the Exhibition Concert-room to listen to that masterpiece of Mendelssohn's that, during the last forty-two years, has become one of the most popular of oratorios in our oratorio loving land. Strange is it, indeed, to read the comments on "Elia" in the different Italian journals; one critic, in a preliminary explanatory article, concludes by striving to reassure "those who fear the grave austerity and monotony proper to religious concerts, that the music of oratorios in kind is dramatic, 'Elia' specially so, containing many passages of grand and imposing effect." By another the libretto is examined, and the unlucky translator is told he has, perhaps, realised the ideal of the libretto nojoso, with his rhymes in or, ognor and furor, and after having thus called poor Pinelli over the coals, coolly adds "that a translation of such a book does not leave much margin to do better," states that Mendelssohn had not a very dramatic temperament, agrees with Grove and Placci that all he had he introduced into "Elia," and then adds that, when writing it, he was in a very bad, nervous state, death was approaching him, though still young, and that his alarms, anticipations, presentiments natural animation and grace—worse actors than singers. Mr. Henry Heyes is entitled to considerable commendation as a voice of pleasing quality and excellent expression in the arduous part of the Dutchman, and a word of praise is due to the sprightly acting and fencing (with "real swords," producing an almost uncomfortably realistic impression so soon after a recent Parisian event) of Miss Isabelle Davies and Miss Gertrude Findon (who also took part in the "Matrimonio"), as the two pretty vivandières in Meyerbeer's famous tent scene. Of the other soloists, Mrs. Stephenson, the Misses Bernstein, Jeannie Mills, MM. Collwyn Thomas, Evan Jones (tenors), and Moore (bass), who did more or less well, bare mention must, for want of space, suffice. We should not omit to add, however, that the "Spinning chorus" in Wagner's work was given with great precision, freshness, and variety of expression by about thirty female voices, and that considerable credit is due to the musical conductor, Signor Ettore Fiori; the dramatic director, Signor Gustav Garcia, and the pianoforte accompanist, Mr. Stanley Hawley, for the successful result of this promising experiment, at which Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, Principal of the Royal Academy, was present.

At the Students' Orchestral Concert at St. James's Hall, on Tuesday, numerous excellent and interesting features demand notice. Special mention must be made of Miss Dora Bright's pianoforte Concerto in A minor (M.S.). It displays a creative faculty altogether out of the common, and is full of bright original fancy, and melodious inspiration of a high order. The second subject of the first movement and the succeeding "Intermezzo" are worthy of almost any living composer. The sparkling Finale is unfortunately rather too short—a fault on the right side, however—and would probably be improved by the interpolation of a sostenuto subject. The orchestral colouring is exquisite throughout. The work was capitally rendered by the gifted composer (a pupil of Mr. E. Prout), who, together with some other lady composers, is destined apparently to negative the generally accepted belief that the female mind is destitute of creative power in music. The other instrumental performances included the andante and rondo for flute, from B. Molique's old-fashioned and sleep compelling concerto in D (op. 69), played neatly and (especially in the cantabile passages) with a fine tone, by Mr. F. W. Griffiths, pupil of Mr. A. P. Vivian; Schumann's beautiful "Concertstück," op. 92, for pianoforte, given with a crisp touch and excellent technique, by Miss Webb, pupil of Mr. Westlake; the first movement of Beethoven's magnificent violin concerto, well, though rather coldly played by Mr. Gerard Walenn (teacher, M. Sainton), and the first movement from Beethoven's piano concerto in C minor, and Liszt's brilliant concerto in E flat, capitally executed by Messrs. Frank Howgrave and Edgar Hulland respectively. The vocal selections included Mendelssohn's somewhat conventional motett, "O Lord, thou hast searched me out," sung with fairly good intonation by female quartet and choir.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The orchestral concert (the last of the term) given here on Monday evening, placed a handsome feather in the College cap, already decorated with a goodly bunch; and raised still higher one's estimation of Dr. Stanford as a conductor. As usual, an excellent programme had been selected:—

Overture to "Egmont"	Beethoven
Duet, "What have I to do with thee?" (Elijah) Emily Davies and Adams Owen (E).	Mendelssohn.
Introduction to Third Act, and Dance of Apprentices (Meistersinger)	Wagner.
Concert-stück in G (op. 92) ... ... Marian Osborn (S).	Schumann.
Aria, "Nobil Signor" (Gli Ugonotti) ... Emily Himing (E).	Meyerbeer.
Symphony in C major (March, 1828) ...	Schubert.

The nervous energy and rugged force of Beethoven's mighty work, the sublimity of which seems to grow rather than diminish by repeated hearing, were realised in a way that suggested entire sympathy with the poetic basis of the work: praise it is not always possible to award even when professional orchestras are concerned. More remarkable still was the rendering of Wagner's melodious and richly-coloured extract. The excerpt is, we think, too long, more than one anti-climax being noticeable; but its beauty and the intelligence shown by the performers, who phrased and shaded in a manner, for students, little short of wonderful, prevented any feeling of weariness. Miss Osborn was, as usual, sympathetic and refined, and Miss Himing made a distinct step in advance by her finished delivery of the page's air. Schubert's glorious Symphony in C brought the concert to an exhilarating conclusion.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Herr Constantin Schwarz gave his second and last Zither recital at Steinway Hall on Saturday. We have before (MUSICAL WORLD, June 2) had to notice this gentleman's remarkable playing on an instrument generally considered childish, and can fully endorce all we then said, his playing of "La Fontaine," by Umlauf, and his own "Kit Kat Polka" being especially good. He also joined Herr Schuberth in Messner's "Nocturne in D Major," and accompanied several of the songs very effectively. Mr. Arthur Lancelot was successful with Kjerulf's "Last Night," and Faure's "Alleluja d'amour," and Mrs. Alexander Warden appeared to advantage in Gounod's "The Worker," and "Fior di siepe," by De Nevers. Herr Schuberth was not in his best form, and Madame Danisi was too nervous to do herself justice—a basket of roses ordered by some admirer, hurriedly offered by one of the attendants at the wrong time, as hurriedly withdrawn, and at the next attempt too late altogether, not improving her in this respect; rarely has a "floral tribute" appeared more ludicrous or more uncalled for. Mr. De Nevers was an efficient and artistic accompanist.

Mr. Emanuel Nelson's concert took place at Princes' Hall on Thursday evening of last week. Mr. Nelson's long experience as a concert manager naturally made us expect something better than is usual at these late concerts, and when we say that Mdme. Liebhart, Mdme. Thea Sanderini, Mdlle. Leila Dufour, Miss Adele Myers, Signori Ria, Gannini, Abramoff, and Monari-Rocca, Mr. Isidore de Lara, and Mr. Frederick King, Signor Tito Mattei (pianoforte), Mdlle. Anna Long (violin), Mdme. Schulz (Hungarian cimbalo), and Signor Bottesini (contra bassi sang and played in their best style, that Miss Louise Lyons and Mdlle. A. M. Ditt recited, that Signori Bisaccia, Ducci, Denza and Romili; that the concert giver himself rendered efficient and artistic aid as accompanist, and that the programme was compiled to suit all tastes, we need hardly add that the applause given was well deserved, and that Mr. Nelson is to be congratulated on an altogether highly successful concert.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Bodda (the latter well-known in musical circles as Miss Louisa Pyne) held a pupils' concert on Friday evening, 20th July, at their residence, 85 and 87 Cambridge Gardens, Notting hill. As usual upon such occasions, the audience mostly consisted of the immediate friends and relations of the young aspirants to future fame, and it goes without saying that they were thoroughly in accord in their sympathies with one another. Yet the manner in which things were done must have given great satisfaction even to a casual visitor. The programme, consisting entirely of vocal items, was gone through in a most admirable manner, and clearly showed the result of sound and thorough tuition. Miss Alice Lamb, one of the students, who has finished the course of instruction at the Academy of Mr. Bodda, has already had some successes on the concert platform. The young lady has a firm contralto voice of considerable register, and will, no doubt, soon be heard in public. Miss Ada Battinson, a soprano, sang and played her part charmingly in Offenbach's operette "Lischen and Fritzchen," the rôle of Fritzchen being creditably sustained by Miss Madeleine Galton. Mr. and Mrs. Bodda were highly complimented at the end of the entertainment, which may be counted amongst the most enjoyable pupils' concerts this season.

Concerts.

SENOR MANJON'S GUITAR RECITAL.

We in England have not been wont to think of the guitar as an instrument of importance sufficient to warrant its classification as a recital instrument. Romantic as it is in associations, conjuring up visions of sunny Seville, and serenading lovers, and senoritas in black mantellas, it would have seemed a little out of place in the unpoetic region of Piccadilly. Senor Manjon thinks otherwise, and the audience which assembled in Princes' Hall on Saturday afternoon seemed converted to his opinion. This was hardly wonderful, for additional interest attached to the concert on account of the performer's blindness, which lent to the concert a pathos otherwise lacking, and which would have accounted for the ready and sympathetic appreciation of the listeners, had the concert itself been less attractive. Senor Manjon's soli were of a comprehensive and ambitious sort. The player is a complete master of his instrument, and in the more legitimate performances, such as the "Valse" and "Polonaise," by Arcas, and the melody, "Primavera," by Senor Manjon himself, revealed a richness of tone and a wealth of expression hitherto unthought of. But we cannot commend the taste which suggested the andante from the "Moonlight" Sonata, as a composition suitable for the guitar. The result of this choice was an exhibition quite unworthy of the genuine artist that Senor Manjon undoubtedly is.

The performances of the concert-giver did not constitute the sole attraction of the afternoon. Miss Carlotta Elliott sang in excellent style two very pleasing and characteristic Spanish songs, a "Habanera," and "Romance," composed by Senor Manjon. Madame Bertini contributed Schubert's "Ave Maria," and Sullivan's "My Dearest Heart," and gave evidence of considerable ability, although she was obviously suffering from nervousness. Miss Esther Barnett, however, certainly supplied the most seriously interesting performances, playing Beethoven's "Thirty-two Variations in C Minor," Rubinstein's "Barcarolle," and Mendelsshon's "Presto Agitato," each of which she gave in a very refined and legitimate way, which told not only of the young lady's own artistic ability, but of the careful tuition of her master, Mr. Thomas Wingham.

M HOLLMANN'S CONCERT.

The concert given by the violoncello virtuoso, M. Hollmann, drew quite a crowd on Monday to Sir Julian Goldsmid's house, in Piccadilly. The artist's exceptional qualities of expression (especially remarkable for an almost unequalled pianissimo) and technique were again displayed, though an excessive use of the glissando in cantabile passages, and a somewhat rough and exaggerated forte, occasionally detracted from the absolute charm of his performances. It is a pity that M. Hollmann's arrangements from Schumann and Bizet, his own spirited Mazurka, and a capital "Carmen" fantasia, were placed at the end of the programme, whilst the "Batti, Batti" and the Adagio and Rondo from Beethoven's Pianoforte Quartet, given moreover rather crudely, and with "strings" instead of the original "wind," might, as merely portions of a whole, have been spared from a rather lengthy concert. Mr. Johannes Wolff distinguished himself in a (so-called) "Andante Religioso," by Thomé, and a Mazurka, by Wieniawski, by feeling and grace respectively; and Herr L. E. Bach introduced a set of clever "Danses Polonaises," for piano duet, of his own composition. In Massenet's "Air du Cid," Mdlle. Janvier, by reason of vocal powers showing signs of wear, was unable to do full justice to otherwise excellent intentions. She did far better in the concert giver's expressive "Chanson d'amour," with violoncello obbligato. Mdlle. Thénard, of the Comedie Française, obtained the usual encore for one of her humorous and pointedly rendered monologues, and the accompaniments were in the safe hands of Signor Bisaccia and Mr. Raphael Roche.

MISCELLANEOUS.

At Steinway Hall, on Friday evening, Signor Ellin Aramis gave his first concert before an English audience. The most noticeable items in the long and interesting programme were Bottesini's "Elegie" and "Tarantella," performed by the composer himself, in his own inimitable manner. The concert giver was suffering from horseness, and, apparently, too, from nervousness; his powerful baritone voice was, therefore, not heard to advantage, and it would be unfair to judge his merits as an artist from Friday's performance; we shall, however, it is rumoured, have an opportunity of hearing him in opera next year. He seemed most at home in settings, by Samarat Abt, of two songs in his native Greek tongue, one of which, "Koimoi," he repeated in response to an unanimous recall. Madame Sandon's rendering of Schumann's "Ich grolle nicht," elicited well-merited applause, Mdlle. Dufour and Mr. H. Williams gave an artistic rendering of Denza's graceful "Nocturne," and Signor de Cristofaro showed what sweet tone can be produced by a skilful player on the mandoline. Mdme. Sanderini and Signor Abramoff also contributed to the programme, and the accompaniments were, it is needless to say, safe in the hands of Signori Tosti, Denza and Ducci.

Mr. Raphael Gordon's concert was given on Wednesday evening last at Steinway Hall, and, taking into account the lateness of the season, a large and fashionable audience assembled. Mr. Gordon has an excellent tenor voice of considerable power and compass, which he displayed to advantage in a "Serenade" by Schubert, Mattei's "Non è ver," and Ascher's "Alice, where art thou?" the latter of which he had to repeat. A tendency to force the voice must, however, be checked. Mdlle. Marie de Lido was in splendid voice, her singing of Mattei's "Dear heart"—accompanied by the composer—being one of the features of the evening, while another was supplied by Miss Maud Boyd, who sang a charmingly piquant song by Odoardo Barri, "Vote for Cupid," with the greatest success. Mr. Frederick King sang in his usual effective style, and the pianoforte solos of Signor Tito Mattei and Mr. Gustav Ernst were given with the artist's usual ability. Mdlle. Hirsch contributed some violin solos, and Signor Odoardo Barri and Mr. Sidney Cooke proved efficient conductors.

Mdlle. Thénard, of the Comédie Française, who has for some years past brightened the London season with her elocutionary talents, has again concluded a series of recitations and of those delightful "levers de rideau" for which the French stage is justly celebrated, given in conjunction with that clever comedian, M. Demey, of the "Gymnase," at the Portman Rooms. The attractions of the last soirée were varied by musical selections, in which Mdlle. Galitzine particularly distinguished herself, displaying fine musical feeling, tasteful phrasing, and excellent technique in some very pleasing and difficult soli on the violoncello. Mdlle. Janvier and Mr. Isidore de Lara contributed some vocal pieces, and Signor Carlo Ducci acted efficiently as accompanist.

Mdlle. Jane de Vigne, of the Royal Opera, Brussels, of whom we had already occasion to speak in terms of warm praise, appeared to greater advantage than ever at her own matinée, at the Beethoven Rooms, where her versatility found fuller scope. Mdlle. de Vigne has a well cultivated soprano voice of rare freshness and flexibility, which she used with so much intelligence that it must be regretted that this clever artist is not to be heard oftener on the London stage. It would be difficult to say in which of her soli by Bizet, Delibes, Tosti (accompanied by the composer), Hollman (with violoncello accompaniment played by the composer), or duets with Signor Carpi, who distinguished himself as an excellent buffo, she did best, all being rendered in equally artistic style. Mdlle. Otto Brönnum sang with admirable taste Grieg's "Solveig's Song" and Kjerulf's "Last Night." The rich contralto of Miss Marion Mackenzie and the fine bass of Mr. Abramoff did full justice to their respective pieces. Amongst the instrumentalists Mr. Hollman's and Signor Carlo Ducci's soli on the violoncello and piano respectively, and the appropriate accompaniments supplied by Mdlle. Alice de Vigne deserve special notice. Mdlle. Thénard, of the Comédie Française, who has become a general favourite, obtained an irresistible encore by means of some highly characteristic and diverting recitations.

ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS.

You are kindly requested to write for Ainsworth's "New Patent Organ Pedal Combination List." Ainsworth's "New Patent" is perfectly unique and may be combined easily with any Piano. It is the only one which may be safely combined with any Piano without deteriorating the instrument. Having put down at my works two engines and machinery of the most desirable kind, I am now supplying my goods at a price which enables every organist and organ student to have always ready for use in his Studio an

ORGAN PEDAL PIANO,

AFFORDING PERFECTLY UNIQUE PEDAL PRACTICE.

34, Sheen Park, Richmond.

DEAR SIR,—I have deferred writing to comment upon your Pedals and Action now attached to my pianoforte until I could satisfy myself of their utility and efficiency. I can now conscientiously say that they more than fulfil all my anticipations. Although I am no carpenter, aided by your lucid diagram I had little difficulty in attaching them myself, and it is impossible to over-estimate the comfort they give to me or to conceive the saving of time one experiences in one's own room.—Believe me, yours truly,

BURNHAM HORNER, F.R. Hist.S.

To Mr. Mr. Ainsworth.

DEAR SIR,—It gives me great pleasure to bear testimony to the perfection of your Invention. I am more than satisfied with your Patent Action and Organ Pedals, and consider them worth double the money. Organists and organ students who desire to improve in the Art of Pedalling, which is so essential to a good organist, will do well to procure a set. I have seen no Action half so effective, and one can sit at the Piano and play, "Fixed in his everlasting seat," or any other organ music, or organ arrangement with the greatest pleasure. The touch of pedals could not be better, and the action is as you say, "Absolutely free from annoyances." They cannot be too highly recommended, as by their use, rapid progress is certain.—Believe me, sincerely yours,

I. B. Thornton,
Organist, Birstall, Leeds.

Cologne, July 16th, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have much pleasure in informing you that your Pedals have given the fullest satisfaction. I have them combined with my practice Piano. Many of my musical friends who have seen them, as well as my organ pupils, are quite delighted with them; and I must acknowledge that I have never met with any Pedals so noiseless and pleasant to play upon as yours. The Action I consider durable, and of very good workmanship. Every organist who desires to perfect his playing will welcome your invention. I can recommend your goods in every respect.—Yours truly,

HERR J. RODENKIRCHEN.

To John Ainsworth, Esq. Organist, The Cathedral, Cologne, Germany.

TOOLS.—In order to facilite the attachment, a complete set of tools are sent (four in number each one marked for its particular use. By the use of these tools, and following carefull the directions, ANY ONE can make a really good attachment.

Royal Academy of Music Local Examinations.—The list of successful candidates in the examination for this year has just been published. The youngest candidate in the London district is Miss Norah Nicolas, aged eight years, who passed in violin playing. The entire list comprises no less than 3,744 names, of whom only two are so young as Miss Nicolas. Her instructor is Mr. Allan Campbell.

A revival of that pretty children's play, "Alice in Wonderland," is contemplated at the Prince of Wales's Theatre at Christmas. Miss Phœbe Carlo, who made such a success as the child heroine, having grown out of the part, Mr. Savile Clark has found it necessary to secure another exponent in the person of Miss Isa Bowman, who is at present to be seen in the tableaux at the Anglo-Danish Exhibition.

Whatever success is attained by "Geraldine," a new comic opera, libretto by Mr. E. Wyatt, recently brought out at Greenwich, will be due to the tuneful music of Mr. A. R. Watson, who conducted on the occasion. The leading parts were sustained by Miss Ethel Pierson, Mr. Fred Salcombe, and Mr. F. Lomax.

The new farcical comedy to follow "The Arabian Nights" will probably be "Atalanta," by Mr. G. P. Hawtrey, which however will not be required until the winter.

The attention of those of our readers who are interested is drawn to Mr. Henry Herman's article in the August number of The Magazine of Art on "The Stage as a School of Art and Archæology."

Mrs. Arthur Stirling and Mr. Henschel are announced as having resigned their appointments on the Professorial Staff of the Royal College of Music, whilst Mr. Arthur Cecil succeeds Mrs. Kendal in stage instruction.

"Carina; or Twelve o'Clock," an operetta by E. L. Blanchard and Madame Julia Woolf, is to be produced at the Opera Comique, in September, when playgoers will have the opportunity of welcoming their old Drury Lane favorite, Miss Victoria Vokes.

On Saturday, the award of scholarships in connection with the Crystal Palace Company's School of Art, Literature, and Science (Ladies) was completed, that for Music being awarded to Miss Matilde Harris, of Norwood. The examiners were Dr. J. F. Bridge and Mr. C. J. Hargitt.

At the last performance of Mr. Harris's season of Italian Opera at Covent Garden, a little pamphlet, entitled a "Descriptive Record of the Season," was issued to the audience. The well-known initials at the end of these descriptive notes would seem to signify that an eminent critic is responsible for their contents.

In consequence of a date having to be definitely fixed by Mr. Horace Sedger for Mr. Carl Rosa's series of comic operas at the Prince of Wales' Theatre, arrangements have been made for the withdrawal of "Dorothy" at the end of the year, notwithstanding its still undiminished power of attraction. The above mentioned season will probably commence in January next with "Paul Jones."

The Reverend Mr. Spurgeon was once asked by an anxious inquirer if he thought it possible for a man who played the trombone to be a Christian. The famous Nonconformist divine replied that the performer himself might be a Christian, but that, in his opinion, the performer's neighbour could not be. We are encouraged by the dictum of so eminent a person to nurse a good many un-Christian feelings against the "latest musical prodigy," if the phrase can any longer be deemed significant. If American newspapers speak truly, there is a boy of twelve who plays upon the trombone. We are of opinion that no jury would convict the outraged musician who should slay this young trombonist. The verdict, would, at worst, be one of justifiable homicide, and at best would recommend the award of a pension to the slayer. In Russia, he who kills a wolf is rewarded; why not he who kills an infantine torturer?

"The Use of the Ballet" is a question which has been, with more or less profit, discussed from time to time by "gods," men—and bishops. In particular, the bishops have denounced, in no measured terms, the depravity of those who delight to watch young ladies in syncopated raiment, pirouette upon their toes. On the other hand, apologists for the ballet have been fertile in excuses for what they are pleased to term "the poetry of motion"; but it has been reserved for M. Gruber, the famous Russian anatomist, to discover a wholly novel merit in these saltatory performances. It seems that M. Gruber had never been inside a theatre, until, a short time since, some friends with difficulty persuaded him to accompany them to the Russian Opera. During the opera, the savant was heard to mutter continually, "Sottises! sottises!" But as soon as the ballet commenced, the principal rôle in which was filled by Mdlle. Adèle Granzow, his friends noticed that the disgust on his face disappeared, and gave place to an expression of lively interest. He evidently took the keenest delight in the performance, and did not cease to scrutinise the danseuse through his lorgnettes. When all was over, his companions, observing that he was still excited, inquired what were his impressions of the ballet. His answer was remarkable. "What muscles, what muscles! And to think that I cannot have them to prepare for my laboratory!" This is surely a novelty in dramatic criticriticism.

There are a good many superior persons amongst us to-day who profess to scoff at the claims of Pope to be considered a great poet. With a certain show of reason, they argue that Pope is sadly deficient in the emotional and lyric qualities which are at present held to be essential; and this charge is in some measure just. But, after all, absolute truthfulness is not a wholly despicable quality in poetry, and it is possessed by the author of the "Essay on Man" to a degree uncommon amongst latter-day poets. Without, however, entering into lengthy discussion on this point, we note with pleasure the successful inauguration, yesterday, of the Pope Commemoration. The chief feature of the proceedings was the opening of the Loan Museum, in the Town Hall of Twickenham. The exhibits comprise manuscripts, "first editions," letters, books, pictures, and relics of all sorts, amongst the letters being some from Johnson, Colley Cibber, Swift, and other of the great poet's contemporaries. The formal opening was preceded by a meeting in the Central Hall, at which the chair was taken by Sir Mount-Stuart E. Grant-Duff, who spoke briefly in praise of Pope's lucidity and wit, which he contrasted favourably with much modern writing. Professor Henry Morley then gave an inaugural address, in which the poet's life and work were considered in an admirably judicial and sympathetic way. If the Commemoration will induce a more general study of Pope, its promoters will earn the gratitude of all those serious students of literature who are able to look beyond ephemeral fashions and to recognize the abiding and changeless principles of art that alone can confer immortality.

sort I have described; it is true that, as a general rule, musical criticism is worse than useless, since it is either depressingly dull and meaningless, or glaringly false and absurd. It needs analysis of a very subtle kind to resolve the constituents of a society like this, that the good may be plainly separated from the bad; and it is indeed almost impossible to say where the blame for such a condition of things should rest. It is quite certain, for instance, that Mr. Gubbins is a man of high attainments and not a little genuinely good taste; could he consult his own wishes, he would not be guilty of such offences, such flat blasphemy against the dignity of art as I have referred to. He is compelled to it by the ignorance of his patrons, who for the most part resent all attempts to train their higher tastes as affectation or impertinence. It is they who have the power of making or marring the success of any artistic undertaking, and from their verdict is no appeal possible to the country musician. Should a few scores of the amateurs in a town band together, let us say, for the purpose of giving oratorio concerts, with what success will they meet? The first concert of the series will probably be well attended, and a profit of a few pounds made; but the second, and the third, will receive less support, a debt will accumulate, until at last the members, weary of the continual subsidy needful from season to season, dissolve their society. It is hardly necessary to say that I do not give this as an instance of that which occurs everywhere and always; but I have known so many cases of the sort, that it must be, in some measure, typical.

In speaking of the ignorances and follies of Arcadia, I have drawn my illustrations from personal experience: lest this account seem prejudiced and ungenerous, it may be permitted me to conclude with the recollection of some of the more favourable symptoms which prevent utter pessimism. I have said that Mr. Gubbins is a genuine musician, who is cramped and swathed in the rigid ignorance of the public on whose support he is dependent. There are amateurs who deserve the name in the highest sense, who devote time and energy, already overtaxed by business, to the cultivation of the best music, and who attain no low degree of excellence, their example surely being not wholly unavailing. I have known, too, an editor to whom my description is absolutely unapplicable, and who, himself an enlightened and honourable man, permitted his critics the most complete freedom and independence. But the most hopeful feature of Arcadian life in my recollection, is the existence of a musician whose attainments were of a most admirable sort, at first entirely unappreciated by those around him. This man, on coming as a stranger to the town in which I then resided, commenced a series of pianoforte recitals, which were performances of the highest order. For two or three years they were looked forward to and supported by the merest handful of enthusiasts; at serious personal loss, the artist continued as he began, making no concessions to popular ignorance, until slowly and wonderingly the public awoke. Little by little they became aware that "classical" music is not synonymous with dry music; the support extended to the recitals became more general, and their success was at length assured. It is by the courage and devotion of such men that the gross darkness of Arcadia must be dispelled.

Correspondence.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

Dear Sir,—Kindly allow me to say that the letter in your issue of the 28th inst., which bears my name and address, was not written by me, nor have I any idea by whom it was written. This is not the first instance which has come to my knowledge of a person writing to a widely-read newspaper in the name of some other person without his knowledge or consent. It is a form of annoyance which, quite conceivably, might lead to very unpleasant consequences. I trust your correspondent will seek some other way of hiding his identity in future.—Yours faithfully,
William Nicholson.

THE SPEAKER ON THE FUTURE OF MUSIC.

The Speaker of the House of Commons presided at the distribution of Trinity College Music Certificates by Mrs. Peel, at the Public Hall, Leamington, on Saturday. The Speaker said the progress which music had made in the last few years was remarkable. It was generally understood that the last fifty years in this country had been practically the development of music, and that during Her Majesty's reign the advance of music had been greater than in centuries preceding. Having some knowledge of public schools, he could say the progress of music made in the great schools of England was something marvellous. The reform Mr. Hullah had accomplished was astounding, and the way in which Mr. Farmer, who was at Harrow, educated boys in the literal sense of education, and made boys whom one would suppose had the voice of crows sing like angels, was marvellous. Mr. Farmer had carried his great efforts from Harrow to Balliol College, and the reform he was accomplishing at Balliol was something similar to what he did in the smaller field of Harrow.

It had often been remarked that music had nothing in nature, but was simply a creation of man's art. He had with him Mr. Haweis's book on "Music and Morals," in which it was said "there was no such thing as music in nature, that there is no musical sound in nature, that it is all a fiction of the imagination, that poets have thrown dust in our eyes, and that if we come to look at nature we shall see there is nothing like a consecutive series of harmonic sounds. The thunder is not musical, the voice of the winds is not musical, there is no music in the nightingale; it is only association. You go out into the still night, and your imagination is touched by the trilling of the bird in the otherwise silent night." He did recognise, however, some musical talents—so to speak—in the production of nature. He summed up by saying, "There is no music in nature, neither melody nor harmony—music is the creation of man." Now he (the Speaker) should endeavour to state his own views in opposition to it. First of all, it had been very commonly held that the only function of music was to produce pleasurable emotion. The poet Dryden has been severely blamed in his "Ode to St. Cecilia's Day," for representing the effect of music upon the passions of Alexander. The comment upon Dryden's poem had been that music could not excite the passions; but he was inclined to think that was a very lame and imperfect criticism of the poem, and he should prefer to take the opinion of a greater man than Dryden—he alluded to the great Lord Bacon, who arrived at the conclusion that "it hath been noted, that though this variety of tunes doth dispose the spirits to variety of passions, conform unto them, yet generally music feedeth that disposition of the spirits which it findeth." There were never truer words than those. It appeared to be one of the great elements in music, to which he looked forward to be a success in our system, that it did not excite the human passions if within the range of a great science, but it feedeth the disposition which it findeth. A man was depressed, and it roused him; a man was joyful, and it excited him to further joy; he wished for condolence in some sorrow, and music softened the feelings, it might be intensified the sorrow for the moment, but gave relief to the sufferer. In that way the sphere of music was unlimited. Looking at the wide range of human emotions, the art which could play upon these emotions was an art which certainly had not reached its full development, and for which he could foresee a splendid future. He preferred to set against Mr. Haweis's miserably low view of nature's music what the great Warwickshire poet had said of the music or the melody of nature. He had put into language which would never die, a far higher sentiment of nature's music and melody, one which was more consonant with our own feelings, and one which tended to give us a still higher idea of our own being, and which was not only worthy of a great poet, but worthy of one who took a true view of nature. Before quoting the lines he would admit there there was much in nature that was unmusical and unmelodious, and he had not long left a place where harmony did not always rule. The scene was in the garden, and Lorenzo and Jessica were walking together in the soft moonlight, and he had pointed to the sky, studded with patines of bright gold, and he used these words:—

> There's not the smallest orb which thou behold'st
> But in his motion like an angel sings,
> Still quiring to the young-eyed cherubins.
> Such harmony is in immortal souls;
> But whilst this muddy vesture of decay
> Doth grossly close it in, we cannot hear it.

BEETHOVENIANA.

Amongst the oddly joined, straggling compositions of Beethoven that have been found here and there, and published by Breitkopf and Härtel as addenda to their complete edition of the great master's works, there are some of the highest interest, whilst others must be rated no higher than occasional trifles nowise indicative of the usual earnestness of the composer. A valued correspondent forwards us the following list of these publications.

(A.) VOCAL MUSIC.

Cantata on the Death of the Emperor Joseph the Second.
Cantata for the Accession of Leopold the Second.
(Both for solo, chorus, and orchestra.)
Chorus for "Die Weihe des Hauses." Solo, chorus, and orchestra.
Chorus on the "Union of Princes."
"Song of Sacrifice," for three solo voices, with accompaniment of small orchestra.
Two Songs for Bass voice, with orchestral accompaniment:
1. "Prüfung des Küssens." (Examination of Kissing.)
2. "Mit Mädeln sich vertragen." (To keep the peace with girls.)
Two Arias to the song-play of Ignaz Umlauf, "The Handsome Shoemaker's Wife."
Aria, "Primo amore piacer del ciel." Soprano and orchestra.
Incidental Music to "Leonora Prohaska," drama by Fried. Dunker.
1. Chorus of Warriors. 2. Romanza. 3. Melodramatic.
4. Funeral March.

SONGS.

"Ich, mit dem flatternden Sinn." Merkenstein.
"The Song of the Nightingale." Song for Frau von Weissenthurm.
Song from Metastasio's "Olimpiade."
To Minna. ("Think of me.") Drinking Song (for a leave-taking.)
Plaint. Elegy on the Death of a Poodle.

FIVE CANONS.

1. Te solo adoro mente infinita, fonte di vita, di verità. 2. Friendship is the source of real happiness. 3. Faith and Hope. 4. Think to-day of Baden. 5. Enjoy Life.

(B.) INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC.

Incidental Music to a Ballet: 1. March. 2. German Song. 3. Hunting Song. 4. Romance. 5. Warrior Song. 6. Drinking Song. 7. German Dance. 8. Coda.
Two Marches for a military band. Do. March Polonaise, Eccossaise. Six Dances for two violins and bass. March for two clarionettes, two oboes, and two bassoons. Three "Equale," for four trombones. Trio for piano, flute, and bassoon. Sonatina for mandoline. Adagio for mandoline.

PIANOFORTE PIECES.

Two Bagatelles. Piece in A minor. Allegretto in C minor. Joyful. Sorrowful. Piece in B flat. Six Eccossaises. Waltz in E flat. Eccossaise in E flat. Eccossaise in G. Allemande in A. Six Allemandes for piano and violin. Fugue in two parts for organ.

In the Funeral March of "Leonora Prohaska" we find the one from the Sonata in A flat, Op. 26, scored by Beethoven himself for orchestra.

FRANK HOLL, R.A.

It is often urged that no man dies of overwork. This may be true, but Mr. Frank Holl is an exception. Although the terrible suddenness of his death comes as a shock to those who knew him only by his works, to his friends and to those who were acquainted with his methods of working, it was only a question of time. He had been working far too much for a long period, and his record of thirty pictures during last year has seldom been equalled. It was in a measure owing to his great love for work that he has gone to an untimely grave at the early age of 43; and it is no less due to the principle of second-best that all this work was thrust in upon him. Sir John E. Millais is England's greatest portrait painter—Mr. Holl was the next. The public of to-day, which gains a very superficial insight into current art at the annual picture-shows at Burlington House, knows the late artist as a painter of portraits only; but mere case, although we need scarcely say that Dr. Mackenzie's technical knowledge has stood him in good stead, he has used it as means to an end. Of the six pieces, by far the most original, both in thought and treatment, are the 'Benedictus' and 'Tema con variazione.' The first-mentioned has a long drawn out subject of great beauty, and is characterised by an elevation of style eminently in keeping with its title. The second is a graceful theme with eight remarkably interesting and original variations. The Saltarello is a piquant example of its class, but bears an unfortunate resemblance to a well-known piece of the same kind by Raff. Originality in dances of this description, however, can scarcely be looked for. The Gavotte is somewhat dry and laboured, and, as Berlioz somewhere says of the Minuet in Beethoven's 8th Symphony, 'la forme semble avoir etouffe la pensee.' The two weakest pieces are the 'Berceuse' and 'Zingaresca': the former is colourless and conventional, and the latter, although pleasing enough, deals with well-worn material. The fact that all these pieces are well within the means of the average amateur should do much to ensure their popularity.

A 'Romance and Scherzino' by J. S. Shedlock (Woolhouse) claim attention by reason of harmonic charm, grace and interest of polyphonic writing, and general unconventionality. The romance is full of tender feeling, the Scherzino arch and significant; both are comparatively easy to play. An Impromptu Valse in A flat by W. Dawson (W. Dawson, Liverpool) is a bright and taking piece, but adds little to the store of ideas originated by Chopin.

Six Melodic Studies, for Pianoforte, by T. A. de Orellana (Charles Woolhouse). Therse are agreeable and well-written studies, which do not, however, display any remarkable individuality of style. No. 1, a study on syncopation and phrasing, reflects very clearly the manner of Kirchner, while Nos. 2 and 5 show in an equal degree the influence of Heller. The remaining three are perhaps more original, but are scarcely so attractive. No. 4 is the "Old Hundredth" given out first as the subject of a fugue, and afterwards in sustained chords with a running accompaniment for the left hand. No. 3 consists of a two-part counterpoint, sometimes divided between the hands with a sustained melody above, and sometimes forming the two upper parts (for the right hand in thirds) with the melody below. As the melody is sustained and the counterpoint staccato, the study is a good exercise on touch. No. 6 is for the practice of arpeggios divided between the hands, with a melody in the upper part.

BOOKS.

The second edition of Mr. J. Spencer Curwen's "Studies in Worship Music" (first series) is before us. It embodies the results of the author's reading during the eight years which have elapsed since the work was first published, and represents altogether an amount of time and labour which no one but an enthusiast would think of bestowing on anything, since adequate pecuniary reward is out of the question. Mr. Curwen divides his volume into three parts: Historical, Practical and Descriptive; the last-named including brightly-written articles on the musical services in some of the principal London churches and chapels. Part I. contains numerous extracts from old writers on the subject of Psalmody. Their quaintness may be judged from the following specimens.

This is from William Riley's "Parochial Music Corrected," 1762. He is complaining of ill-timed flourishes 'which put the congregation out,' and in support of his case quotes this verse—

The Lord's commands are righteous and (shake)
Rejoice the heart likewise;
His precepts are most pure and do (shake)
Give light unto the eyes.

Here is an interesting extract from 'The Compleat Psalmist,' by John Arnold (1769), who must, surely, have been an ancestor of the famous Mrs. Brown:

"That most noble instrument, the organ, having now made its most magnificent appearance in cathedrals and churches in London and other of our cities, but also in churches of many of our market towns throughout this nation; which is now brought to such a great perfection that I have seen some advertisements in the newspapers of church organs of the machinery kind, which are so contrived as to play (having barrels fitted to them for that purpose) a set of voluntaries, also most of our ancient Psalm-tunes, with their givings out and interludes, which are very commodious for churches in remote country places, where an organist is not easy to be had or maintained and may also be played by a person (unskilled in music) who is only to turn a winch round which causes the barrels to play the tunes they are set to; which organs also generally have or should have a set of keys to them that a person might play on them at pleasure notwithstanding the barrels."

There is a flattering reference to the organ in York Cathedral which Mr. Thomas Mace, in 1644 Clerk of Trinity College, Cambridge, speaks of as "a most excellent-large-plump-lusty-full speaking-organ which cost (as I am credibly informed) a thousand pounds."

'The pigmy spites of the village spire' are well exemplified in a letter published in Hooker's Weekly Miscellany for Feb. 14, 1741:—"Some parish clerks when party disputes run high are proud to pick out a malignant Psalm, one which they imagine suits with the state of public affairs or with some transactions in their own parishes, and cast a reflection upon them whereby a part of the congregation is grieviously scandalized while the other is unseasonably diverted."

The following shows how true are sometimes the instincts of the unsophisticated mind:—"A poor man asked by his minister why he did not join in the singing of the Psalms replied 'David speaks so plain that we cannot mistake his meaning, but as for Mr. Tate and Brady they have taken away my Lord and I know not where they have laid Him.'"

With the weightier matters discussed in the second and third parts, we must deal on another occasion, meanwhile cordially recommending the book to all interested—and who is not?—in one of the Divine Art's most influential branches.

The third number of "The Meister," the quarterly Wagnerian paper, is just issued. The promise of the early numbers is more than fulfilled, for the articles it contains are of great value and interest. We are given a continuation of the masterly article, by the Editor, on "Parsifal," in which the complex characters of Amfortas and Kundry are explained with considerable analytic power, and the Feast of the Grail is vividly pictured. Mr. Dowdeswell's earnest paper (second part) on Schopenhauer's "Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung" should command the attention due to one who has thoroughly mastered a wide and difficult subject, and whose mode of expression is clear and vigorous. A very striking feature of the present number is Mr. Alfred Forman's English version of the scene between Isolde and Brangane from the first act of "Tristan und Isolde." Translation of such a libretto as that of Wagner's work is not an easy task, and Mr. Forman deserves the highest commendation for the success with which he has attacked its difficulties. Not only is his version faithful to the original in letter and form, but it has not a little of the dramatic intensity so difficult of translation. The second part of Wagner's "Art and Revolution," with the addition of some reviews, completes the number. In the notice of the Conversazione held by the Wagner Society in June, the services rendered by Mr. Armbruster and Miss Pauline Cramer are duly acknowledged; but the name of Mr. F. H. Frost, the singing of whose admirably trained choir of ladies contributed so largely to the enjoyment of the evening, is, through an evident oversight, omitted. Some acknowledgment, too, should surely have been made of the excellent services of Miss Marguerite Hall, Mr. Nicholl, Mr. Henry Phillips, and Herr Carl Mayer.

COSPEL-OAK CROVE, MALDEN ROAD, KENTISH TOWN, LONDON, N.W.

John Murray, jun., the Rev. Dr. Rogers, James Turpin, the Rev. Henry White, E. H. Thorne, W. Woodall, M.P., Walter Parratt, Dr. Gladstone, James Higgs.

The Chairman proposed the toast of the evening, observing: When I was applied to to accept the post I now occupy this evening, I confess I was at first very unwilling to accede to the appeal. It was not because I was tolerably well occupied with a variety of miscellaneous occupations, but that it occurred to me the position would probably be better filled by one who could have spoken with a fuller knowledge of his qualities than I can pretend to do. But on reflection, it seemed to me that possibly there might be reasons why one who had not those particular qualifications might nevertheless be the better qualified to be the mouth-piece of those to whom I am speaking on such an occasion as this; because the feelings we desire to express are not merely those of personal friendship, or the feelings of those who have come into personal contact with the guest of this evening. Dr. Stainer commenced his musical life in the service of the Church. At that time even he displayed his unusual musical gifts. I do not, of course, mean to go through the whole of his musical career, but I cannot but connect the commencement of it with, what down to the present time—and only down to the present time—is its close. I cannot deal with that which came in between except very briefly. After being for a time in London, we find him at a very early age occupying an important position in Worcestershire, and then proceeding to Oxford, which may be called his other home, for between London and Oxford his life has been divided. We find him at Oxford, at the early age of 20, organist at Magdalen Chapel, a position of no mean responsibility for one so young in years. Not contented with devoting himself entirely to musical pursuits, he found time to go through the ordinary curriculum of the University, and added to his musical honours the ordinary degree of other men. And during the years to which I have alluded, engrossed naturally with much study, he found time to create as well as to acquire, because with his earlier years in Worcestershire, I believe, is associated an anthem often sung in many a place at Christmas time; and, with the later Oxford years to which I have alluded, one of his best known anthems perhaps, "The Lord sitteth on the throne," is connected. We find him fitly after his Oxford career crowned with the position of organist to that University. There he remained till, in the year 1872, he became organist to the cathedral church where his first musical life had begun. And I think it is with that musical life in London that his memory with those who have known him will be associated. It is as organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, and in connection with the wonderful work he accomplished there, that Sir John Stainer will be remembered. I do not think it is possible—at all events, scarcely possible—to speak in exaggerated terms of the good work Sir John Stainer did at St Paul's, and the improvement he introduced there, and the remarkable pitch of perfection to which he brought the musical services in that place. I believe it was said of the services of which he was the head, by a great living foreign musician, that he considered the musical service at St. Paul's the finest religious music in the world. So far as one in the plenitude of his ignorance can speak, I can speak of it myself, because I have heard and enjoyed, many a time, the services in St. Paul's Cathedral, and it has always seemed to me that the service was brought to that degree of perfection which gives the most intense musical satisfaction to those whose souls were endowed with music, without, at the same time, distracting the mind to enjoy the music alone, and rendering it impossible or difficult to follow the devotional ideas. If I have said that with any justice at all, it seems impossible to give higher praise than that to Sir John Stainer. Gentlemen, it was not only St Paul's, St. Paul's was not the limit of his musical activity. During that time he composed many pieces which will long be part of the heritage of those who are interested in the music of the Church, and in addition to that, he also composed, and sent forth into the world, glees and madrigals, which will long be sung, and which will long add to the brightness of the world. Gentlemen, I have briefly touched on these leading points, or some of them in Sir John Stainer's career. But what I have said would be incomplete if I were not to add something more. He was in music under Government, designed to foster and spread the love and knowledge of music among the children of the kingdom. That position, I have reason to know, he undertook with considerable reluctance, and at some sacrifice to himself; but the good work he has done there all who are acquainted with the circumstances must fully and thoroughly recognise. I have spoken hitherto of Sir John Stainer as a musician, and as such I must mainly speak of him. But, nevertheless, what I have said would also fail of its fulness if I were not to express in a word or two what all of those who come in contact with him have found of him as a man. There are some great musicians of whom, perhaps, all might be said that I have said of Sir John Stainer, who, nevertheless, would find it somewhat difficult to attract around a table on such an occasion such a gathering as this. And it speaks not only to Sir John Stainer's qualities as a musician, but as a man also, that so many friends are here to meet him to-night. They have been touched by his genuine, hearty goodness. He has drawn them towards him (as I know all who have had to do with him have been) by his genial, straightforward character; and they have consequently learnt not only to admire him as a distinguished musician and a very remarkable musical artist, but also as a man worthy of their honour, affection, and esteem. Now, I am quite sure there is but one feeling, and that of regret, that his distinguished career in connection with our great cathedral should have drawn to a close. The cause of it will be regretted by everyone as well as the result. We feel, at the same time, that it is but natural that, leaving London, he should return to Oxford, to that other home where the other portion of his life has been spent; and I am quite sure he will carry with him there the goodwill of all whom he has known. It is not so far distant from the Metropolis in which we are assembled, that it is impossible he should sometimes see us here, or that we should sometimes see him there. I have received since I have been sitting in this chair a communication from Oxford which I am desired to convey to our guest. I am not quite sure that he will appreciate what a very great honour it is that is conveyed on him by this communication. It is a communication sent to me by a masonic lodge — St. Mary Magdalen Masonic Lodge—who desire to connect their congratulations with ours. And if Dr. Stainer (whose only demerit that I know is that he is not a mason) will only realise what qualities they shall be that can evoke a communication from a masonic lodge, solemnly assembled together, he would know it was to be appreciated as no small compliment. I can best conclude what I have endeavoured to say by reading on your behalf to Sir John Stainer the address that has been prepared and signed. I will not detain you longer, but ask you to drink the health of our distinguished guest, and wish him, as I am sure you do heartily, every prosperity and blessing that can attend a man in the remainder of his life that is to come.

The toast was then drunk.

Sir John Stainer thus replied: My lord chairman, my lords and gentlemen, I am very sorry to break off that beautiful burst of song that was just beginning, but I ask permission to be allowed to answer this kind toast at once, instead of having the responsibility hanging over my head while the glee is being sung. It is very difficult for me to make any reply to such a very kind toast as that Lord Herschell has made, and to the way you have received it. I suppose it would be impossible for me not to be moved by such kind expressions of such an assembly as I see around me this evening. Lord Herschell has been kind enough to allude to my life at Oxford, and I must say my quiet work there (where I went on the even tenor of my way) was disturbed by having to come to Saint Paul's. I foresaw the amount of responsibility and the work it would involve, but my association with the cathedral as a boy made it impossible for me to say no to such a call as that. I felt very diffident as to whether I had the ability to go through the task of reorganisation, but certainly I had the power of will to do my best, and I felt I had opportunities that other people had not, and I came up to St. Paul's through the introduction to the Dean and Chapter of Dr. Liddon. I should be very sorry if it were supposed that in saying the music of St. Paul's was not in English music in our Church services. That is a portion of the art of music in which foreigners can only, to a certain extent, tread; and I hope the Royal College and the Royal Academy of music will thoroughly attend to the requirements of Church composers, and give them good training for the purpose. In my early days, the education for writing Church music was very haphazard. I hope, in future, that will never be able to be said. I should only have been too glad to be attached to the staff of the Royal College, as Sir George Grove asked me to be, if Mr. Mundella, my kind friend here, had not asked me to work under the educational department. Lord Herschell has referred to that. I think English people are not aware of the changes going through our elementary schools; indeed, I am sure they are not. Some person wrote, the other day, to a paper asking if we were paying £120,000 a-year for children to shout through their noses, "God Save the Queen," and "Rule Britannia." That system was broken down completely four or five years ago; and during the last year, I think about a million and a-quarter of English children in our elementary schools have passed the sight-reading tests of our inspectors. The number, no doubt, will gradually increase, and I look forward to the time when English people will have admirably improved in their singing. Choirs, in my time, have improved in a marvellous way. In my early days, three out of every four members of a choral society sang by ear, by listening to the men next them, and coming in after them. I will say no more, except that I felt very much indebted to you for your kindness to-night. You have given me a reception, the memory of which I shall carry to my grave. I feel, also, that you have, done a great honour to the profession to which I belong; and I think your kindness, when it is known, will give a stimulus to young students, and satisfaction, I think also, to the older members of the profession. Indeed, I think what you have done to-night will throughout the country raise the status of the musical profession generally.

"Bind my brows," by Sir John Stainer, was then sung by the choir.

Canon Gregory spoke as follows: I feel that some representative of St. Paul's Cathedral ought to say something on this occasion. If Sir John Stainer had said less of me I should have less to say to you about him, but after what has been said by him I should like to tell you how we enjoyed working with him, and what a privilege it was to have him, and to assist him. I think we hope—some of us—to have a scholarship and prizes for some of the boys who come from our school, and we should very much like to have it in the name of Sir John Stainer. We do not propose in any way to tout for subscriptions, or to ask for subscriptions, or to send any kind of begging letter round for subscriptions; but we mean to do what we can ourselves for it, and if anyone else would like to see Sir John Stainer's name on the walls of the Choir School, and would like to think that the boys are educated to think of him, and to follow in his footsteps, we should like to have their co-operation. It must be entirely spontaneous.

Sir Arthur Sullivan, in the course of his speech, observed:—It would be a very difficult task for even the most experienced speaker to attempt to add to the effect of the eloquent and graceful words with which Lord Herschell has so thoroughly and accurately represented our feelings. In the few words I am about to utter no such presumptuous thought is in my mind. But I can conceive that it may be a satisfaction to your noble spokesman, and, perhaps, to Sir John, also, if he should learn from the mouth of a musician how cordially and heartily we musicians endorse all he has said. It is a great satisfaction for me to speak on this occasion, because I think I am, perhaps, one of the oldest friends of Sir John Stainer in this room. I recall with pleasure how our acquaintance first began in 1854, when we were choir boys, he in St. Paul's, and I in the Chapel Royal. That acquaintance has since ripened, through long years, into the most affectionate friendship. As boys we spent a good deal of time together; we spent our half-holidays—the only time we had to spend. Both of us being of "a musical turn," as they say, we discussed music and musical matters, the compositions of the great masters, with so much judgment, experience, and discretion, as I have no doubt we should have heard from his lordship had he carried out his first thought. We did not content ourselves alone with that, but turned our attention to more practical matters. And as this seems a time for reminiscences, you will forgive me if I mention one. We were once on the brink of a very great and useful invention. We were staying at Sir Frederick Ouseley's College, and Sir Frederick Ouseley was at that time putting up a very large, fine organ in his church, and he was also indulging in many costly experiments as to pipes, pedals, and many other matters. This organ was our admiration. One of us (I don't know which) conceived the brilliant notion that gutta percha would make a cheap, resonant substance for organ pipes. Our financial means were limited, but, like all true inventive genuises, we were not to be baulked, so we got together a few old gutta percha soles (at that time very much in vogue), and set to work with ardour and enthusiasm. But here we were stopped, because the horrible smell we made poisoned all the building, and Sir Frederick Ouseley stopped us in the very initiative stages. I cannot help thinking to this day that there was a bit of jealousy in it. In after years it was also my good fortune to be associated with Sir John Stainer at various times, and more especially on that occasion to which he has alluded to-night, in that institution afterwards developed into the Royal College of Music. And, I must say, I was struck by his energy, tact, judgment, and, above all, by his unfailing spirits, and humour. Even after a long meeting of the council he was bright and cheerful, and that is saying a great deal. I think I have some claim to speak as to his qualities and to his character. Sir John Stainer may perhaps have asked himself why this latest honour has been conferred upon him. Now his modesty (which is really one of his most striking characteristics) may have made him shrink from acknowledging the true reason. I have no such scruples. I will tell you. It is because he is a great master on the king of instruments, it is because he is a profound, eager student; it is because he is a zealous and enthusiastic teacher; it is because he is a composer of power and imagination, and it is because he is a man of blameless honour. My lords and gentleman, I will detain you but a moment longer, but I have a task to perform, and a very agreeable one it is. I am sure you will agree with me in thanking Lord Herschell very much for his kindness in coming to preside over us to-night; and, when I ask you to drink his health, I am sure you will do so with enthusiasm.

The toast was then drunk.

The Chairman said in reply: My lords and gentlemen, I can assure you it has been an unmixed pleasure and satisfaction to me to preside to-night—I said unmixed somewhat unadvisedly, because I am always reluctant at having to make a speech; but you have received my efforts in that direction so kindly, and I feel that if I have expressed your sentiments towards Sir John Stainer, I have done that which will be always a pleasant recollection to myself, and it will be more than a reward for any difficulty I have had in presiding over you. I ought, before sitting down, to read you a telegram which I have received in the course of the evening. I have already alluded to one communication from the Masonic Lodge at Oxford. I have received another, and it will be interesting to all as showing the breadth to which the influence of our distinguished guest is extended, and the very different circles in which he is being thought of to-night. This is the telegram I have received: "The Officers and Members of the Cardiff Blue Ribbon send hearty congratulations to Sir John Stainer, on his well-deserved recognition by Her Majesty. Hope you have a pleasant gathering to do honour to one we so much esteem."

"The long day closes," by Sir Arthur Sullivan, was sung by the choir, and in response to prolonged applause was repeated are useless to the artist unless the creative or crystallizing influence be upon him. And not alone useless, for he is even unaware of a tenth part of this mental wealth. But the fire of his emotion reveals to him the resources of his store by drawing to itself, out of their remote and forgotten recesses, what it requires; thus the subtle affinities existing between all the experiences of life are by the influence of this inspiring desire brought into play.

Hence the observing and reflective faculties in art are chiefly to be confined to action before and after the favorable moment: to preparation and criticism. The artist has the power to develop these to almost any extent by practice and study.

By practice "in cold blood" of the work which he hopes to produce at the bidding of inspiration, that the handling of the material may be easy and that no impediment to the free exercise of the emotional impulse be allowed to clog its flow; and by criticism, that he should learn to reject and prune the work after the emotion has cooled. This critical process can hardly be dispensed with, and for this reason. Few minds have been so carefully trained as only to be open to worthy impulses, few so guarded as only to have retained beautiful and noble experiences. The cleansing fires of emotion can, we know, turn much into gold that was dross or clay, and undoubtedly where the fire burns very brightly, little criticism is afterwards necessary. But so seldom is this the case, that it is as well to preserve the critical faculty as a check. The more perfectly, however, the preparatory part has been trained, the less will the critical be needed; the less perfectly, the more will this be required.

The only absolutely original part of the artists' productivity, therefore, is the feeling which impels him, by the crystallizing process already explained, to "shape" in a certain way rather than another. The result of this, the shape itself, may be called his invention, that is to say, the form in which his feeling manifests itself. Many persons have the feeling, but produce nothing by it; are not impelled to utter it outwardly by any permanent record. These, though not artists, are the members of the community to whom the artist appeals, to whom he looks for sympathy, and appreciation, and to whose incohate impressions he supplies the unifying influence they would otherwise lack.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

To take careful note of the progress made in art by a sister country is one of the most profitable and interesting things with which we can be occupied. A general proposition of the sort will not be denied; still less need opposition be feared to the statement that English musicians, in especial, may find much instruction in a close inspection of the condition of musical art in America. Our Transatlantic cousins have, in the main, the same musical traditions and heritage as ourselves; and we of "the old country" have reasonably enough been curious to see how those traditions and memories would be affected by transplantation. We have seen that music can flourish with vigour in the virgin soil; but after all we can look upon the question only from the outside. It is the merest platitude to point out that it is impossible for an English critic to view American art from the American standpoint; and it is therefore with an unusual interest that the report of the conference held during the past month at Chicago by the Music Teachers' National Association will be read in England. From small beginnings this association has grown to be a powerful body, representative in almost every way of the aims and needs of professional musicians in America.

On the morning of July 3, the Central Music Hall was filled to its utmost capacity, with an audience composed chiefly of musicians, a large number of whom were ladies. The address of welcome to the visitors was given by Mr. A. C. Story, the President of the Board of Education, after which Mr. Max Leckner, the President of the Association, read the annual address, which reviewed in an able and exhaustive way the work done in the past year. He dwelt at length upon various defects in the administration of the society, which to a greater or less degree hinder its usefulness, and suggested, inter alia, thorough revision of the list of vice-presidents, offices too frequently filled by those who have neither time nor inclination to fulfil the duties of their position. He also advocated with considerable boldness the entire abolition of the presidency.

Mr. Leckner was followed by Professor Calixa Lavallé, who had attended the recent meeting of the National Society of Professional Musicians in England. He read a highly interesting account of his reception by the kindred society, and dwelt upon the advantages to be reaped by a closer union between two bodies so similar in their object. Professor Lavallée concluded his address as follows:— "Have we not gained much by establishing the plan of sending a delegate abroad—a plan which, as you know, was ridiculed by many; a plan which is yet hardly accepted by some who would limit our work to the four walls of the United States? But they complained and continued to complain, ignorant of what was actually being accomplished. In conclusion I must say to you that it is not my wish to have our European connections stopped with what is already done. We must send a delegate every year and make firmer the bonds already existing. And with this we must not stop. We are destined to enlarge our resources, and before many years I hope to see our association recognised and welcomed on the Continent, as it has been welcomed and recognised in England. We should not be satisfied with less than this."

The most interesting feature of the second day was certainly the essay read by Mr. N. Coe Stewart, of Cleveland, on "The Music Teacher's National Association; what it has accomplished, and what it may learn from other teachers' associations." Mr. Stewart referred in his essay to the first meeting of the association at Delaware, Ohio, twelve years ago, a time when the assemblage was laughed at and ridiculed as a parcel of singing masters and mistresses. At that time the active membership was only sixty-two. From that time forth, the history of the association shows a gradual and merited progression, until at the Cincinnati meeting, Theodore Thomas tendered the members of the association a concert and the idea of the National College of Musicians was projected. Subsequently, meetings occurred at Albany and Buffalo, and it was resolved to carry out at each annual meeting an entire programme of orchestral and choral numbers with special preference for the works of American composers. At the last annual meeting, the membership exceeded five thousand, and some of the American composers conducted their own works. Mr. Dana, who led the following discussion, spoke particularly of the aims and objects of the association, dwelling with emphasis on the higher musical education. He did not forget to find much for flattering notice in the history of the past twelve years, and grew quite enthusiastic over the glowing future of the association.

CHESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

The triennial Chester Festival, which is of comparatively recent institution, took place last week. Its promoters have had many things to contend with, not the least evil being the apathy, and in some cases, the active opposition, of those who should be foremost in a work of this sort. The opposition has been of such a character as to throw into higher relief the success which has attended the festival. More than this need not be said of prejudices which can never seriously hinder the steady march of art.

One novelty only was included in the week's programme, a setting by Mr. Oliver King, of the 137th Psalm. "By the Waters of Babylon." a work of which we will speak in its proper place. The other works presented were the "Elijah," the "Lobgesang," Verdi's "Requiem," Gounod's "Redemption," Beethoven's "Engedi" and C minor Symphony, Spohr's Motett, "How Lovely are thy Dwellings Fair," Sullivan's "Golden Legend," Stanford's "The Revenge," Dr. J. F. Bridge's overture, "Morte d'Arthur," Raff's "Lenore" symphony, and a few other orchestral works of greater or less importance. The executive forces arrayed were of entirely adequate strength; the soloists being Madame Nordica, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Belle Cole, Miss Damian; Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. W. Nicholl, Mr. Brereton, Mr. Price, and Mr. Santley. Mr. Straus was the leader. Mr. J. T. Hughes the organist, and Dr. J. C. Bridge the conductor, The Festival was inaugurated on Sunday, July 22nd, by a performance of the "Hymn of Praise," in the Cathedral, the doors of which were thrown open to that part of the public which cannot be expected to afford average festival prices. This is a step in the right direction, and worthy of all praise. That the poorer section of the population should be wholly debarred from the enjoyment of such music as Mendelssohn's is a thing always to be deplored, though of course often inevitable. No more fitting way of opening a festival week could have been found. The solos were taken by Miss Anna Williams and Mr. William Nicholl, who proved themselves entirely capable of meeting the dramatic requirements of the music. The orchestral prelude was played admirably by the band, which seemed, however, to be placed rather too far from the male portion of the chorus, the result to the latter being a slight tendency to sing flat. The soprano portion of the chorus was particularly good, and indeed, when allowance has been made for the unusually hard week of rehearsals, the voices of all were surprisingly fresh and vigorous. The Cathedral was filled to the point of discomfort, by an audience that can hardly have comprised less than 6,000 persons.

The following Monday and Tuesday were devoted to further rehearsals, and on Wednesday the proper business of the Festival commenced with the performance of "Elijah." The rendering of an oratorio that is familiar to every English musician does not demand much comment, especially when it is said that the solos were in the hands of Miss Anna Williams, Madame Belle Cole, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. Every one knows how Mr. Lloyd sings "Then shall the righteous shine;" and with what fire of inspiration Mr. Santley enacts the part of the prophet on Mount Carmel. Madame Belle Cole gave an extremely beautiful reading of "O rest in the Lord," not less impressive because, to some extent, novel. The band and chorus, under Dr. Bridge's conductorship, were perfectly successful.

On the evening of the same day, the "Golden Legend" was given in the Music Hall, Sir Arthur Sullivan conducting in person. It would be useless now to say much by way of criticism of the merits of the graceful work in question, which the English public has decided to look upon as a great composition, essential to the completion of a festival programme. We have only to say of the performance now under consideration, that the composer can hardly have wished for a better rendering of his melodious work. The dramatic incidents of the prologue were given with much spirit by the band, and the rendering of the final fugue, "The deed divine," must be classed as a superlatively good example of choral singing.

Madame Nordica gave due pathos to the music allotted to Elsa, while Miss Damian sang the brief, but not unimportant, contralto solos with much feeling. Mr. Lloyd's superb rendering of the part of Prince Henry is another of the old tales that need no re-telling; but to Mr. Grice, a young baritone who sang the part of Lucifer, the commendation and encouragement appropriate to an artist of excellent promise, should be frankly given.

The "Golden Legend" was followed by Dr. Stanford's ballad, "The Revenge," a work which, by virtue of its many dramatic qualities, certainly deserved a somewhat better place. It suffered somewhat on account of want of freshness, both in chorus and orchestra. Indeed, the most conspicuous fault of the whole Festival was the attempt to do more than could be fairly done in the allotted time.

The Cathedral performance on Thursday was opened by two works by Mr. Oliver King, a young composer to whom the task had been entrusted of writing two sacred works for the Festival. Of these, however, one only was given, although the place of the unpresented work was taken by three movements from the same composer's Symphony in F. In this work, it must be admitted that Mr. King has somewhat mistaken the requirements of symphonic writing, which include a greater breadth and force than he has here displayed. The lack is hardly to be attributed to incapacity, for in the finale there is ample evidence of a power not to be discovered in the almost trivial treatment of the earlier movements of his symphony. The other work from his pen was the setting of the 137th Psalm, "By the waters of Babylon," which appeared to produce a deeper impression. Unequal it certainly is, but the slightly unvocal passages in the first part are atoned for by the powerful concluding chorus, "Remember the children of Edom, O Lord," which is written with a freedom and vigour of expression that augur well for Mr. King's future success. Equally praiseworthy is the recitative, "For that they led us away," in which, as in the succeeding chorus, there is nothing undeserving high praise.

The remainder of the programme was made up of works known as Beethoven's C minor Symphony, which received full from the orchestra; Spohr's motet, "How lovely are Thy d fair," the solos in which were admirably given by Miss W Madame Belle Cole, Mr. Nicholl, and Mr. Brereton. Perh greatest impression of the day was produced by Verdi's "Req The "Dies Iræ" was particularly well given by Madame N Miss Damian, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Brereton.

The evening of the same day was occupied with a miscell Concert in the Music Hall, when a varied and interesting prog was gone through. The vocal music was supplied by Madam Cole, Mr. Nicholl, and Mr. Santley, in whose hands it could otherwise than safe. Perhaps the greatest success was obtai Madame Cole, who gave Weber's "O Fatima" with adn expression. The instrumental selection was of considerabl sustained interest, for it embraced Raff's "Lenore" symphon "Hungarian March and the Dance of the Will o' the Wisps Berlioz's "Faust;" Wagner's "Ride of the Walkyries;" an Bridge's "Morte d'Arthur" overture, all of which were exce played.

The last day of the Festival was devoted to the performan the morning, of Beethoven's "Engedi" and a repetition "Hymn of Praise," and in the evening of "Gounod's "Redem It may not be entirely useless to protest against the use adaptation of Beethoven's great work. It is difficult to se "The Mount of Olives" should not be given in its original instead of forcing the music into an association wholly foreign master's purpose. Such a proceeding can only be deemed an sacrilege. However this may be, technical praise of a high so be freely given to a performance of which the chief feature w singing of Mr. Edward Lloyd, who met the demands made upo in the most complete way. Schubert's unfinished Sympho B minor completed the first part of the programme, the second occupied with the "Hymn of Praise," the solos of which were by Miss Williams, Madame Cole, and Mr. Lloyd. The great once more repeated his familiar success in this work, the magni number, "We Called Through the Darkness," being given w dramatic intensity which was profoundly impressive.

A festival which opened with the "Elijah" could scarcely closed more fittingly than with the "Redemption," to which noble ample justice was done. The soloists were Madame Nordica sang "From Thy love as a Father" with exquisite feeling; Damian, who did her share well; Mr. Nicholl, whose narrative was given with much intelligence and taste; Mr. Brereton, an Santley. With this programme closed a Festival which has be more than local and temporary interest, and which was by no n unworthy of the great cause to the furtherance of which i devoted.

THE UNION JACK.

Adelphi melodramas have become a byword. They are suit a certain, and if we may judge from the crowded state of the ch parts of the house, a considerable section of old-fashioned goers. What most goes to make up a modern melodrama extravagant version of possible but unlikely adventures. The so of a virtuous heroine; the temporary triumph of smooth-face well-dressed villainy; the heroic attitude of a lowly champio the low comedy of humble servitors are the material from whic authors evolve a 'sensational' plot. It is the bounden duty of all good playwrights so to concoct their scenario as to p telling situations in which the leading actor and actress may de in guttural tones high-sounding and obvious platitudes. machinist and scene-painter also must not be forgotten.

All these necessary components have been incorporated b Henry Pettitt and Mr. Sidney Grundy in their latest addition repertoire of the Adelphi Theatre.

The plot suffers, as is too frequently the case, from the nec of spreading the action of the play over four long acts and scenes. All goes well until the end of the second act; thencefo the play drags. Obviously written to afford opportunities to M Gatti's rara avis in Terriss and to Miss Millward, it must be a disappointing to these great mainstays of melodrama tha audience would seem to find more pleasure in the 'Peter Fly' o

J. L. Shine and the "Polly Pippin" of Miss Clara Jecks. Without doubt the comic element is the most welcome in the 'Union Jack.' The villain (Mr. Charles Cartwright, as usual) is old in iniquity, but weak in deed.

One admirable feature of this melodrama is that the feelings of the audience, albeit sufficiently harrowed to suit the most fastidious taste, are soothed not further off than the middle of the play. It is too often the custom to leave the spectator in agonizing suspense until within measurable distance of the inevitable final marriage peal. The arch-villain, however, is happily dispatched by his partner in evil machinations at the end of the third act; nevertheless, though the wicked cease from troubling, the weary are not at rest, and the cloak of iniquity finds a fitting Elisha on whom to fall. For three more scenes, Sir Philip Yorke (Mr. J. D. Beveridge) harrows and persecutes suffering innocence; but the reckoning cannot be for ever staved off; in fact, this army contractor never seems quite at home in his wickedness, and the handcuffs are not long in finding their way to his wrists. As we have already hinted, the chief honours of the performance fall not so much to Mr. Terriss and Miss Millward, as to Mr. Shine and Miss Jecks. We are surfeited with sorrow and bloodshed, but real and unforced comedy is not so common. The Tom Chuckle of Mr. Dalton Somers, moreover, adds not a little to the excellence of the lighter parts.

It is the custom—an excellent one—to applaud successful scenic effects, and Mr. Bruce Smith, Mr. W. Perkins, and Mr. W. Telbin, are to be congratulated on at least three of their "sets." Most worthy of praise, perhaps, are the Road to Whitesand Bay and the Toll-gate. The taking title of the drama conveys no insight into the plot. It is of little consequence whether it is known as "The Union Jack" or "The Workhouse Jill." We are thankful, however, for small mercies in the dull season. W. L. C.

THE MONTHLIES.

The Musical Times commences with a six column summary of the London Season, a subject on which we hope to have our say next week. The eighth and concluding paper by the Editor on the "Material of Music" deals, though rather briefly, with the principles of form, and their exemplification in oratorio and opera. The following remarks are so excellent that we reprint them:—"What Gluck began, and Mozart continued, Wagner completed, and the effeminate graces of the Italian school have ceased to charm. All true art is progressive, and the forms commonly used and accepted by musicians, which were the result of long and earnest endeavours to bring them to perfection, are yet in a transitive state, the outcome of which it is impossible to foresee." F. C. contributes another of his amusing, but always thoughtful, articles, "Some Kinds of Music," the "transcendental" style being this time the subject; and Mr. Joseph Bennett continues his biographical sketch of Schumann.

The new number of the "Magazine of Music" is remarkable for its well-chosen diversity of subject matter. An interesting notice (with portraits) of the Bauer family is a prominent feature, Master Harold Bauer, the gifted pupil of Mr. Pollitzer, having a full-page portrait all to himself.

Mr. Marshall Hall contributes some well-written, if somewhat rhapsodical, remarks on Beethoven's Mass in D, and in "Music: Tone Poetry" continues a valuable addition to musical æsthetics. Mr. Maurice Strakosch, in his "Souvenirs of an Impresario," gives a curious public the full benefit of an unrivalled experience. An excellent portrait of Mr. Manns and some interesting woodcuts of Chichester are prominent features.

Concerts.

The youthful pianist-composer, Florence Menk-Meyer, gave a farewell recital at the elegant little Marlborough Rooms, Regent Street, bringing forward some compositions of her own, which bespeak a poetic temperament, a natural flow of musical ideas, and considerable technical skill. These were qualities especially conspicuous in the first two movements of a "Sonate descriptive," op. 11, a dainty "Cradle Song," a brilliantly effective "Valse extatique," and in a series of twelve tone-pictures comprised under the title "Wandern im Schwarzwald," amongst which "The Lark," "Chimes," "Brooklet," "Waterfall," "Meditation," "Phantoms," "Pegasus," "Cyzmala," may be cited as specimens of excellent and in some instances highly original musical characterisation, varying from the airy and graceful to a degree of intensity and weird fancy, scarcely to be looked for in a girl of seventeen. Signed with the name of a famous composer, these ingenious pieces would unquestionably command attention. Unfortunately, we cannot speak in equally high terms of praise of Miss Menk-Meyer as an executant, her technique being as yet unfinished, and although this impression may be due to excessive nervousness in the performance before an unfamiliar and critical audience, if her reading of Chopin's music be, as we are assured, owing to the teaching of a pupil of Chopin himself, we certainly prefer the traditional interpretation given to those works by such performers as Liszt, Frau Schumann, Charles Hallé, and others, who also knew and heard Chopin. Miss Menk-Meyer should see to this, for with her evidently musical organisation she has a right to aspire to a prominent position among artists of the day.

Signor Carlo Albanesi held a Soirée Musicale at the Steinway Hall last week, when a large and brilliant audience came together to do honour to the popular artist. Being an invitation concert, it was, of course, characterised by a delightful absence of formality, and only commenced at 9.30—half-an-hour later than the time announced. Signori Albanesi and Esposito gave an excellent rendering of Saint-Saens' Variations (for two pianos) on a theme by Beethoven, and the two artists were also heard in an Andante by Schumann, the Etude in F minor by Chopin, and Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre." The Marquis de Piccelellis joined Signor Albanesi in Beethoven's Variations for violoncello and piano, in which the Marquis played like a Marquis. Their performance was frequently interrupted by loud "Bravo" calls emanating from the back of the hall, where the ladies' darling held quite a private reception of his own. Signor Esposito gave a good reading of Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata, and Mdlle. Dufour sang songs by Goring Thomas and Vaccai in a most charming manner. The above were the components of a programme which must have lasted till midnight, as it was but half over at eleven o'clock. There were long breaks between each piece, which allowed the audience an opportunity of discussing the merits of the composers and their works. There is, after all, something in being able to spread a short programme over a whole evening, and Signor Albanesi has shewn us how to do it in the most pleasant way.

MDLLE. CORNELIE D'ANKAS REAPPEARANCE.

The reappearance of that operatic (or rather "operettic") favourite, Mdlle. Cornélie D'Anka, if not in her rightful place—behind the footlights—at least on the platform of Princes' Hall, at her concert, on Saturday, was welcome to her many friends and admirers, although it might have been urged that with Tito Mattei as the composer of no less than three songs, Tito Mattei as the composer and performer of two pianoforte soli, and Tito Mattei as accompanist in chief, the entertainment was too much like a concert of this clever and fashionable pianist, whilst there was far too little (musically speaking) of the charming bénéficière, who oddly enough limited her own performance to two out of the three above-mentioned ditties. Her audience no doubt would have been glad to hear her in a repetition of some of her former triumphs, especially as her vocal gifts retain almost their original freshness, and her powers of expression have lost nothing of their charm.

Very agreeable vocal items were also contributed by Mesdames Susetta Fenn, Leila Dufour, and F. Rubini Scalisi; MM. Frederick King and Ria made their usual effect, and Signor Monari Rocca, in good voice, sang with artistic spirit; but Mr. Sinclair Dunn found a pretty song, "Lovelit Memories," by the Marquis de Leuville, decidedly too high for his voice. Last, though by no means least, the Marquis himself delighted the audience with a recitation, "The Choice of Arms, a duel at Biarritz," his impressive delivery and picturesque style eliciting a double recall and distinct requests for an encore which, emanating from so many fair listeners, it must have cost the gallant Marquis no small effort to resist.

ORGAN PEDAL PIANO,

Affording Perfectly Unique Pedal Practice.

34, Sheen Park, Richmond.

Dear Sir,—I have deferred writing to comment upon your Pedals and Action now attached to my pianoforte until I could satisfy myself of their utility and efficiency. I can now conscientiously say that they more than fulfil all my anticipations. Although I am no carpenter, aided by your lucid diagram I had little difficulty in attaching them myself, and it is impossible to over-estimate the comfort they give to me, or to conceive the saving of time one experiences in one's own room.—Believe me, yours truly,

To Mr. Ainsworth. BURNHAM HORNER, F.R. Hist. S.

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to bear testimony to the perfection of your invention. I am more than satisfied with your Patent Action and Organ Pedals, and consider them worth double the money. Organists and young students who desire to improve in the Art of Pedalling, which is so essential to a good organist, will do well to procure a set. I have seen no Action half so effective, and one can sit at the piano and play, "Fixed in his everlasting seat," any other organ music, or organ arrangement with the greatest pleasure. The set of pedals could not be better, and the action is, as you say, "Absolutely free from annoyances." They cannot be too highly recommended, as by their use, rapid progress is certain.—Believe me, sincerely yours, I. B. THORNTON.
Organist, Birstall, Leeds.

Cologne, July 16th, 1886.

My Dear Sir,—I have much pleasure in informing you that your Pedals have given the fullest satisfaction. I have them combined with my practice piano. Many of my musical friends who have seen them, as well as my organ pupils, are quite delighted with them; and I must acknowledge that I have never met with any Pedals so noiseless and pleasant to play upon as yours. The Action I consider durable, and of very good workmanship. Every organist who desires to perfect his playing will welcome your invention. I can recommend your goods in every respect.—Yours truly, Herr J. RODENKIRCHEN.

Facts and Comments.

"It is ill jesting with an aching heart," said that eminent legal luminary, Mr. Serjeant Buzfuz. Had Mr. Serjeant Buzfuz ever occupied an editorial chair, he might not less fittingly have dwelt upon the hardship which compels an editor to write of facts, when there are none to write of, and to comment upon things which have not taken place. Such is the fate of a musical editor in the summer holidays, when London is "empty," and there are no more concerts. It is certainly strange that for the few millions of workers who are left in London during the summer months, so little music should be provided, and that they should be dependent for amusement of this sort upon the charms of the Covent Garden Promenade Concerts.

At any rate, Mr. Freeman Thomas, the manager of these concerts, does his best to make them thoroughly attractive. The prospectus of the forthcoming season is published, and contains a goodly number of names of great and popular artists. The sopranos include Mdlle. Nikita, who will sing four nights weekly for five weeks; Madame Valleria, whose engagement extends throughout the whole season; Miss Alice Whitacre, Miss Susetta Fenn, and other ladies. The four contraltos engaged are undeniably the finest artists now before the public, being Mesdames Patey, Belle Cole, Scalchi, and Antoinette Sterling. Mr. Sims Reeves is announced to sing twice a week for five weeks, and the other tenors are Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Henry Piercy, Mr. Orlando Harley, Mr. Banks, and Mr. Sidney Tower. The list is completed by Mr. Santley, Signor Foli, Mr. Barrington Foote, Mr. Ludwig, and Signor Novara. Mr. Carrodus will lead the orchestra of 150 performers, which will also be augmented by the band of the Coldstream Guards, and Mr. Gwyllym Crowe will conduct. We are glad to notice that the "classical nights" will be continued, as these are, from a musical point of view, the most valuable features of the series.

When is a young musician old enough to escape the charge of being a prodigy? We ask this question because Charles Haydn Arnold, of whose career we desire to say a few words, is only seventeen years old, and the praise demanded by his success is of a more serious sort than any that can be given to an infant phenomenon. However, we will give the facts of the young gentleman's history, and leave our readers to decide whether he is to be classed amongst the genuine musicians, or the abhorred army of prodigies. Charles Haydn Arnold is the son of Mr. Matthew Arnold, Organist and Professor of Music, Enniskillen, and at nine years of age presided at the organ and conducted the musical part of the service in Enniskillen Parish Church, during the long and tedious illness of his father. Since then he has held the office of organist at Derryvullan Church, also St. Michael's Church, Trory. He has been appointed quite recently (out of many candidates) to the responsible position of organist and choirmaster at St. Flannan's Cathedral, Killaloe, Limerick, where there is a surpliced choir and choral services. The Irish Times, in speaking of his appointment, refers to him as holding the unique position of being the youngest cathedral organist in the three kingdoms. The young gentleman in question is also a clever pianist and violinist, having (assisted by his father only) given pianoforte recitals (in public) of classical music before eminent critics and members of the cognoscenti in the musical world. Certainly Mr. Arnold has had a striking, if a brief, career, and it is to be hoped that his success may prove of a permanent sort.

not yet taken place. In a word, the English people manifest a love for sound generally rather than a capacity to distinguish between music and "the other thing."

But it has apparently been decreed that all our pleasures shall be accompanied by an equilibrating pain. How else explain the fact that when enjoying the best music we are mostly compelled to parboil in a blood-vitiating atmosphere, whilst the blessings of pure air and sea breezes are invariably accompanied by much that is musically atrocious, and more that cannot by any stretch of courtesy be called "music" at all? The street-music nuisance is bad enough in the metropolis, Heaven knows! but it is at least intermittent. At the seaside it is almost incessant. Then, too, as if it were not enough that the degrading filth yclept "comic songs," and the maudlin twaddle imitated from fifth-rate American ballads, should exist at all, these also find their way to the coast. For the rest of the year these excrescences flaunt in the music-halls or hide in slums, and our wives and children are spared. But at the sea-side this dirty rubbish (the epithets are used advisedly and with connaissance de cause) is thrust under the very noses of those whose minds we strive most strongly to keep innocent and pure.

If the New York Churchman is to be believed, they manage these things much better over the water:

> "New York is become as justly celebrated for its summer-time music as for its splendid winter orchestral seasons. The municipality takes care that excellent military bands give weekly concerts afternoons and evenings, among other places at the Battery, Washington and Tompkins's squares, and at the Mall in Central Park on Saturday and Sunday afternoons at four o'clock, where the band of the Seventh Regiment is heard, under Cappa's direction. At Coney Island, the Manhattan Beach establishment still retains Gilmore and his inimitable military band. A remarkable specialty in Mr. Gilmore's management is his splendid adaptation of the great orchestral masterpieces, where the indispensable string element is represented by various delicate and sympathetic shadings of reeds. At the rejuvenated Brighton Beach the undertaking of Herr Seidl, of the Metropolitan Opera House, and its magnificent orchestra, arouses the enthusiasm of our most cultivated and intelligent critics, and all are agreed that watering-place music has reached its culmination under the baton of the learned conductor. His programmes display an unprecedented knowledge of compositions old and new. There is generally a Wagner number on every programme, but the director pays due honor to the recognised masters of all schools, and it is not unlikely that our American composers will have a hearing."

The many admirers of Miss Bertha Moore will be glad to hear that notwithstanding her marriage with Mr. Huth, which will take place on the 24th inst., she has no intention of abandoning her professional career. We trust the happy pair will be able to answer the question "Is Marriage a Failure?" with a very decided negative.

We have been surfeited with "Jubilees" from "George's Jubilee" to that of His Holiness Leo XIII., yet one has been forgotten. The Jubilee of Promenade Concerts should have take place on January 12th of this year. It is probable that the origin of these popular entertainments may be found in those musical performances which formed a not entirely indispensable portion of the entertainments at Vauxhall and Ranelagh. But the first of the "Promenade Concerts à la Musard" was given at the Colosseum on January 12th, 1838, Plenty of rivals filled up the interval down to January, 1841. when the versatile and "very French" M. Jullien started his "Concerts d'hiver" at Drury Lane. The programmes during that series were not wonderful, including as they did waltzes, quadrilles, galops and catchpenny songs; but Jullien sometimes gave a small dose—usually a movement at a time —of classical music, and with the aid of such artists as Arabella Goddard, Madame Pleyel, Ernst, Sivori, and the then youthful Charles Hallé, really did much to popularize good music. A comparison between the programmes of "then and now" would afford an admirable index to the progress of popular taste, or rather (as it would be correct to say) the progress of those who cater for it. Popular taste can be pulled up or down by any close observer who is, at the same time, musically competent.

Fräulein Roth, prima-donna at the Darmstadt Opera, will take the part of Elizabeth in the Bayreuth performances of Tannhäuser announced for next year.

Apropos of Bayreuth, a correspondent informs me that at one of the performances of Parsifal the tenors and basses omitted to come in at the passage beginning "Zum letzten Liebesmahle." Mottl, the conductor, with great presence of mind, shouted to his orchestra "Ten bars back," and back they went. For thus saving the performance at a critical point Madame Wagner next day presented Herr Mottl with a valuable breast-pin. But we should like to know how such a mishap came to be possible at Bayreuth?

The death is announced in Paris of Mlle. Fatou, after a long and painful illness. She last appeared at the opera in the rôle of Helena in Robert le Diable. The deceased artiste had achieved her position by dint of hard work, her natural gifts not having been remarkable.

Madame Nevada Palmer has left Paris for Milan, where she will "create" the part of "Mirella" in Gounod's opera.

Colonel Mapleson is now at Aix-les-Bains, bracing himself for the numerous libel actions which may be expected to follow the publication of his Memoirs. We are informed that the Italian, French, German and American rights have been sold, and that the English edition will appear on or about the 20th inst. It will be published by Messrs. Remington.

It is hinted by Mr. Arthur Pougin in "Le Menestrel" that the relations between the director of the Paris Opera and his artists are open to improvement in the direction of cordiality. Be that as it may, Mr. Jean de Reszké will turn his back upon Paris on the first day of June next, and as if in these days it were not enough to lose one tenor, Mr. Saleza has "gone over" to the Opera Comique. The Opera will still possess four tenors, it is true, MM. Escalais, Muratet, Duc, and Cossira. But none of these, unfortunately, is a de Reszké.

Mr. Charles Fry is announced to give a Recital from the Poets and Humourists (including several scenes from Shakespeare), at the Birkbeck Institution, on Wednesday next.

The following sensible remarks from a "leader" in the Hastings Observer deserve the widest publicity. They are made apropos of the "amusement" afforded to the late Mr. H. J. Byron by a dramatic criticism in one of the local papers:

> "I am afraid it must be admitted that the soberly-written critiques of local writers really do furnish a rich source of 'amusement' to readers of culture. I by no means claim immunity for the Observer in this respect, but I may be permitted to point that I have repeatedly spoken of the absurdity of the public setting any special value upon many of the professed criticisms of musicians and players in the local papers, since such notices are, for the most part, the productions of immature minds, and very youthful scribes. The 'great editorial WE' is often ridiculous enough when employed by Editors themselves, but when used by a small boy just apprenticed, or by an adult who knows nothing of music, and whose own speech betrays not only his ignorance of the elements of elocution but of the principles of ordinary English pronunciation, to appland this, or decry that, in an entertainment, the 'WE' is put to an absurd and pitiful use indeed. Yet, lamentable as is the existing system of Press notices of concerts and dramatic representations, it does not seem that it is likely to find a speedy end. It is wholly impossible for a newspaper Director to have a competent representative at every public entertainment given in this town. The Observer has, during the last few years, endeavoured to send capable critics to the more important concerts; nevertheless, it would be idle to deny that too often the inability of the Editor to secure the attendance of two or three competent men in half-a-dozen places at one time, necessitates the handing over of notices of entertainments to the tender mercies of young gentlemen, not as fit for the fulfilment of the function assigned to them as the conductors of this journal could desire, and perhaps, as the public have a right to expect."

We are of opinion that the souls of sundry editors of the London press would greatly benefit by similar confessions. Our brother of Hastings may be voted more candid than discreet, but "WE," at least, thank him.

Messrs. Machlachan and Stewart will shortly publish a collection entitled "Songs and Hymns of the Scottish Highlands." The English words are by Mr. L. Macbean, the translator of Dugald Buchanan's "Spiritual Songs." The importance of authentic versions of national airs being, we trust, now fully recognised, it is to be hoped the arrangement of these has been confided to sympathetic as well as competent hands. Nothing is more irritating than national music "corrected up to date."

We occasionally hear of a talented family, but they are generally a little mixed both as to sex and talent. Mrs. Fraser, however, may be congratulated on the success her daughters are achieving on their tour. Of these five fair Frasers, Miss Violet is a vocalist and actress—for the young ladies perform, with the help of Miss Elsie Evans and Messrs. Henry Yates and Oscar Bird, a pretty operetta "The Widows"—the Misses Mabel and Stella are violinists, Miss Ethel is excellent on that rather masculine instrument, the viola, and Miss Ida is a 'cellist of no mean merit. In addition to this, the two last-named ladies are clever performers on the pianoforte. Dover, Folkestone, Worthing, and other places have just had an opportunity of anticipating the pleasure their friends will feel at their re-appearance in London.

A new comic opera, "The Grand Duke," libretto by Farnie and Murray, music by Tito Mattei, will be produced at the Avenue Theatre, after the run of "Nadje," which has been so successful in America.

Mdme. Nordica has created a great impression in Berlin. The Stratsburger Zeitung says that in "Faust" and "Traviata" her singing was excellent, and that her acting was as near perfection as could be wished. All the German papers say that her "Valentina" in "Les Huguenots" is the best they have heard for many years. We are authorised to repeat our previous statement that Madame Nordica will not on any terms sing this year in the United States.

The German papers are giving with evident gusto a new edition of a very old tale. We have all heard in one form or another how a very eminent conductor was honoured at a rehearsal by the presence of the notabilities of the town, how he selected the bassoon to run through his part until he had scared away his uninvited audience, and how we are to take it all cum grano salis. Of course this very practical joke is now attributed to Dr. Von Bulow, and the bassoon part said to be that of Beethoven's "Choral Symphony," inordinate length being naturally the essence of the plaisanterie.

Weber's posthumous work "The Three Pintos," has recently been given with great success at Dresden and at Prague.

Our German cousins are evidently determined to push their trade! No less than 179 German firms are exhibiting musical instruments at the Melbourne Exhibition.

If German manufacturers are busy, French composers are not less so. Gounod is finishing "Charlotte Corday," and is remodelling his "Romeo et Juliette," Godard is at work on "Dante and Beatrice," Delibes on "Cassia," and Massenet and Thomas are each preparing something for the coming season. St. Saëns is engaged on a new opera, "Ascanio," which, however, it appears, is merely "Benvenuto Cellini" under another name.

BAYREUTH IN 1888.

By Louis N. Parker.

The cast of Parsifal on August 12th was as follows :—

Parsifal - - - - - -	Van Dyck.
Kundry - - - - - -	Therese Malten.
Gurnemanz - - - - - -	Wiegand.
Amfortas - - - - - -	Reichmann.
Klingsor - - - - - -	Scheidemantel.
Titurel - - - - - -	Dr. Schneider.

Miss Malten is known in a sort of way to London musicians, as she has appeared more than once on the concert platform here. But only those who have seen her in Bayreuth and on her own stage at Dresden can form any idea of her genius. Her Kundry has ripened and developed in the two years which have elapsed since I last saw her, and is now a magnificent performance. Kundry is a creation which, apart from the music which envelopes it, would be quite beyond the powers of even the greatest tragic actress. In no other drama that I am acquainted with has a poet been bold enough to expect his leading actress to go through an entire act with only two spoken words. Wagner, it is true, has even greater courage than this, and, placing his tenor hero with his back to the audience, bids him stand wordless and almost motionless during the greater half of the first act of the same drama. But in this case the action on the stage is of absorbing interest, so that we are unmindful of the hero's presence until the psychological moment when he quivers with sympathy at the recital of Amfortas' fall. Kundry, on the other hand, is en evidence throughout the act. She has to express in dumb-show a great variety of emotions, and yet not only has she no word to say, but we are made to feel that any words would be out of place. This tour de force would be quite impossible in the spoken drama; it is made possible, it is made natural, nay, necessary, by the presence of the orchestra, which is all the time laying bare the inmost thoughts of the personages on the stage. The two factors play into each other's hands, as it were. The actress is an impersonation of the music, and the music is a spiritualisation of the actress. And this, again, would be an impossible effect with a visible orchestra, because then the hearer would not connect the music with the actress on the stage, but with the performers in the orchestra.

All this, however, does not make the dramatic artist's task any easier; on the contrary. Kundry has not only to look and act so as to satisfy our ideal of Kundry; she has to rise to the level of the orchestra; she has, in short, to be as great as the composer's expression of her. When I say that Miss Malten fully satisfies every one of these conditions, I feel I have given her the highest possible praise. I confess I linger with particular pleasure over her performance; indeed, this great artist in the character of Kundry deserves a paper all to herself. Now, however, I must hurry on. Though I am a rabid Wagnerian, I confess to considerable dread of the German Wagnerian tenor. With the exception of Vogl and Gudehus, there are few of them who are pleasing to the eye or grateful to the ear. They are mostly fat and flat. Who does not shudder at the memory of Schott, Goetze or Erl? The parts they have to sing and act are so splendid that the actors seldom come up to one's preconceived notions of what they should be like. Therefore I awaited Van Dyck's entrance with considerable trepidation. Would he also be fat and flat? I am delighted to be able to say that he was not too much of the first and none of the second. Indeed, to be brief, he seems to me an ideal Parsifal. He is a splendid actor, and I should say that again (for the first time, probably, since Schnorr von Carolsfeld's death) the ideal Wagnerian heroic tenor had been found. The other performers need scarcely any special mention. Reichmann's Amfortas is by this time well known. It is a magnificent performance of a horribly difficult part. In the third act of Tristan the hero has to sing for an hour lying on a couch; almost the entire part of Amfortas has to be sung and acted in a reclining posture. No wonder if the singer sometimes sings flat.

I should like to warn the pilgrim to Bayreuth who, like myself, goes there for pure enjoyment, not to get behind the scenes too much; indeed, to have no commerce with any of the executants at all. Of course, I intend no disparagement to them whatever; no one who has visited Bayreuth can have anything but the profoundest respect for this magnificent body of unselfish, devoted artists. But, if you once begin to get mixed up in the tittle-tattle and stage-door gossip and learn the secrets of the stage, your ideal will evaporate. I made the mistake of going over the stage. From one point of view this was, of course, deeply interesting; but I must confess that the knowledge of exactly how the Grail became luminous, how the blood appeared on the spear, and how the bells were managed, recurred inconveniently at the most solemn moments of the play.

Secondly, don't, pray don't, believe any of the astounding fables which find their way into the press. The latest and most ghoulish of these is to the effect that Wagner's grave is neglected. Is it necessary to remind my readers that it is practically owing to the courage and loving devotion of Madame Cosima Wagner that we are able to enjoy the Bayreuth plays in all the grandeur and purity of their author's intention? Would this admirable wife, who has consecrated her whole life to the memory of her husband, allow his grave to be defiled?

Lastly, to all who have a visit to Bayreuth in view I would say, join the London Branch of the United Wagner Society at once. I owed many little courtesies and a most comfortable apartment with the kindest of landladies to the fact that I am a humble member.

As a postscript, I may add that, considering the circumstances, life in Bayreuth is astonishingly cheap. I must except the theatre restaurant, where you have to pay a great deal for very little. The best plan is to have table d'hote at the Golden Anchor and coffee at the Burgerreuth.

MUSIC, AND ITS RELATION TO THE OTHER FINE ARTS.*

For why should we communicate these secrets—why wear our hearts on our sleeves? Isn't every well-bred Englishman aware that it is "bad form" to betray anything beyond an icy indifference to all matters—except outdoor sports? And surely the inutility of an art whose chief characteristic is its power of awakening sympathy must be self-evident. For "sympathy" means feeling with, or for, others: and that, as we have seen, "makes" (as Matthew Arnold would have said) for "bad-form." This, no doubt, is why musicians are such a disreputable lot.

With regard to the material of the arts, so obvious are the distinctions that it would be a waste of time to draw attention to them. Every one knows that music uses sound, that painting uses colour, poetry words, and sculpture some kind of plastic material.

It is equally obvious that some of these are arts of Space, others of Time—that we cognise certain arts by comparing successive impressions, and others by comparing simultaneous impressions. There can be no doubt that this fact makes a difference in the degree of symmetry requisite, since it needs a splendid memory to compare successive impressions with the accurate perception of proportion which even an ordinary mind can bring to bear on objects seen together. But we must not make too much of this: for one of the arts whose chief effects are successive (Music) is able, as we have seen, to present certain effects of form simultaneously; and besides, when we have heard even a long piece of music very often we retain an impression of it as a whole. Certain pieces of poetry, too, translate themselves, if we are very familiar with them, into a picture on the mind, which also we can recall as a whole. But SPACE and TIME are dangerous guides to employ on any exploration: they soon lead us to the borders of a land of which I have already spoken: a land where nothing is anything and everything is something else.

But if neither materialistic nor metaphysical classifications help us, I must record my conviction that scientific methods are, when applied to the philosophy of art, positively harmful. I mean this: it has been discovered that sounds are merely vibrations of air, which the ear receives as a single simple sensation, to which we give the name of "sound." It has also been discovered that proportion between the vibrational numbers of sounds is the cause of our pleasure in their combination. Hence it is said, by some, that music is nothing but rhythm—pitch itself being only a subtler form of it. Similarly it has been discovered that colour is only the result of vibrations of light, the different rapidities of which received on the eye give the sensations which we name "red," "blue," "green," &c. Forthwith we have many well-intentioned investigators laying great stress on the affinities between colour and music.

Such views appear to me to be not only useless, but absolutely harmful, because tending to direct our attention to quite unimportant facts, to the neglect of important ones. Let science, by all means, tell us such things; for it is the province of science to dissect the universe for us—to show the unity which pervades its laws, and to reveal much that our unaided senses could never have perceived. Not so Art! The ultimate fact, the simplest element of Fine Art is human sensation. Colour is to us a simple sensation. So is the pitch of a tone. We are not in the least conscious of vibration, even though it be possible to see the movement of a string which is sounding. The eye may observe, but the ear does certainly not detect. With colour it is even more so. The number of vibrations in a sound is already very great, extending to some thousands (even tens of thousands) per second; but with colour it is an affair not of thousands, but of millions, per second.

These discoveries have turned the heads of many worthy and clever people. For instance, in Gardiner's celebrated work, "The Music of Nature," there is a list showing the equivalent in colour of each instrument:

Trombone = Deep Red.
Clarionet = Orange.
Flute = Sky Blue.
Bassoon = Deep Yellow.
Viola = Rose.
Trumpet = Scarlet.
Oboe = Yellow.
Horn = Violet.
Violin = Pink.
Cello = Red.
&c. &c.

Now it must not be supposed that I wish to suggest there is no analogy between these things. There is; but it is of a totally different kind to that implied here. The emotional effect produced by a trombone may be similar to that produced by deep red; that is to say: deep red has the power to call up a certain emotional "atmosphere," so to speak, and a trombone has the power to call up, perhaps, the same emotional atmosphere. But to assume or to suggest that the trombone calls up a sensation of deep red is a species of midsummer madness to me inexplicable. Its absurdity would be seen much better if the thing were put the other way. Say that the colour deep red suggests the sound of a trombone, or that at sight of an orange you are reminded of the clarinet, and every one will think you a lunatic. But put it the other way, and say that the clarinet suggests an orange tint to you, and you are credited with a singularly-penetrating musical organization!

---

* A Lecture delivered in April, 1888, before the Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts.

The trumpet is an aggressive, obtrusive, arousing sound. Scarlet is an aggressive, obtrusive, and arousing colour. But "colour" and "sound" are the names of sensations, not of emotional states, and the trumpet does not give the sensation of scarlet any more than scarlet gives the sensation of a trumpet. The word "colour," as applied to instrumental timbre, has nevertheless been so widely adopted that we cannot hope to see its use die out. Berlioz himself says: "Instrumentation in music is what colouring is in painting." And Raff says: "Melody represents the outlines, harmony light and shade, and instrumentation the colouring." All this shows what a mistake it is to attempt to found a theory of æsthetics on a scientific basis.

Scientific investigation tends more and more to reveal the identity of Nature's laws. The various manifestations of the physical world are shown to be merely combinations of elements which vary but little, if at all. But the ultimate facts of Fine Art, on the other hand, are referable to the consciousness of man, and man is conscious of various states. In vain for science to demonstrate that Thought, Emotion, Sensation, are only different aspects of the same thing. Man is conscious of the difference between them; and upon these differences must any Art-theory be based, and not upon the scientifically demonstrable unity of their nature.

Science shows us the illusory nature of our unaided senses. Yet it is by means of these alone that we receive artistic impressions. We do not examine pictures with microscopes, nor listen to symphonies with microphones.

The co-ordination of sensations is the first artistic fact. Simple sensation, the result of nervous stimulation, is the basis of artistic pleasure, but is, in no sense, art. When the relation of one sensation to another is felt, the sense of proportion begins to act, and this is the foundation of art. If we speak of Fine Art, as contradistinguished from other manifestations of human activity, there is little doubt but that we ought to mean only those productions which exist for the gratification of the senses, and of that faculty which co-ordinates: otherwise the sense of form.* But man is not a mere passive recipient. He brings to every impression at least as much as he receives. He brings endless combinations of former impressions (themselves complex) and memories, the awakening of any train of which, by newly received impressions, causes these latter to possess the effect of a language. The universality of this language depends upon the degree of similarity between men with regard to their store of impressions. Certain shapes, colours, rhythms, and timbres vivify such associations, and on these our judgments must be founded. It is obvious, for instance, that in a country where white is the colour of mourning, black will not have the same emotional effect as it has upon an Englishman, and so on.

All this is entirely apart from the direct appeal to sympathy, by a representation of events either by imitation or description. A distinction must here again be made. Direct imitation (Drama, Painting, Sculpture, even) makes the least demands upon the spectator's receptivity and imagination. Poetry, Architecture, and Music, on the contrary, demand from the spectator or hearer a considerable degree of imagination. He must possess a stock of concrete images, and of stored-up feelings, by means of which to construct the descriptions of the poet; a stock of associated moods, feelings, and shapes, by which to enjoy emotionally the work of the architect; and a stock of associated moods, feelings, and sounds by which to understand the language of the musician. For "sounds," says some one, "do not give us a picture of events, but only lead us to infer that they are happening."

I have grouped Music, Poetry, and Architecture together. The affinities of music and poetry are too obvious to need description: the elements of rhythm and, when the poetry is read aloud, of tonal variety (heard in vocal inflections), are patent to everyone as the

Is he a catalogue compiler—a mere tabulator of the sights and sounds around him? Does he "sing because he must;" in other words, produce because he enjoys doing it, and for no other reason? Or does he produce because he has learnt the trick, and because that is at least as good a way of making a living as any other?

MUSIC.

We have received for review the first four numbers of the "Practical Violin School" for Home Students, in which Mr. James A. Fleming meets, in the completest way, a want that must have been sorely felt. Many, with plenty of enthusiasm, but limited means, have been discouraged from attempting the study of this most difficult of instruments by the often-made assertion that self-tuition in the case of the violin is an impossibility. But assertions are not necessarily facts, and Mr. Fleming, by the lucidity and copiousness of his explanations, by the emphasis with which he insists on details, apparently trifling, but really of the utmost consequence, and indeed, by general thoroughness of treatment, should be the means of affording many an amateur the opportunity of contradicting, in the most practical way, this universal belief. Specially excellent are the clear directions for tuning the violin and holding the bow and instrument—matters of which we fear few professors make their pupils realize the importance. A concise, and admirably written, chapter on "The Philosophy of Musical Sounds," is a feature as welcome as it is novel in treatises of this kind. When we add that the paper is good, the print clear, the drawings in illustration of the text admirable, and the cost nominal, it is evident that the success of Mr. Fleming's work should be great and immediate.

"Grace, my lovely one," ballet for five voices, by T. Weelkes; "Construe my meaning," canzonet for four voices, by Giles Farnaby. Edited by W. Barclay Squire. (Stanley Lucas & Weber. Part Songs Nos. 311, 312). A German critic, in noticing these two recently published pieces in the Monatsheft fur Musikgeschichte for 1888, No. 8 makes the following interesting and accurate remarks, of a kind not commonly met with in Germany regarding English music:—"These composers both lived at the end of the sixteenth century, and the euphony of their music is peculiar to the period. The English composers, however, had arrived at that euphony earlier than the Continental ones had. The influence of the artificial counterpoint of the Netherlands school was not felt in England as it had long been felt on the Continent. From the earliest times of polyphonic music, the English composers were able to write agreeably (wohlklingend), both in melody and harmony; and the two pieces in question are good examples of the points which distinguish England from other nations at this date. The character of the Church modes is so entirely relinquished, and the mode of expression so much allied to modern keys, that it is difficult to believe that the music belongs to the sixteenth century. In addition to this, the rhythm is strongly marked, and the words well and spiritedly declaimed. Such are the peculiarities which essentially distinguish the English school of this date from its contemporaries. In the seventeenth century, the school addicted itself with success to solo vocal music; developed an astonishing productivity; and seized so rapidly on new forms and styles of expression, that its productions display more flexibility even than those of Italy. England had thus at one time an extraordinary gift for both melody and rhythm, although the gift appears since to have slumbered for some time to such a degree as to have given the nation the title of an unmusical one."

At all seasons of the year, whether for a garden party or a brilliant ball, new waltzes are ever welcome. Here are the names of some recent arrivals: "Sweet Lavender," by James Weaver; "Alexandia," by Leonard Gautier; "For Ever and Aye," by Nelly Parker, (the latest accession to the ranks of lady composers); "Charming," by Bogetti; and "Midnight Dreams," by Kussman. These sets, especially the three first-named, are melodious, graceful, and good for dancing.

BOOKS.

"The British Bandsman," a monthly journal for wind instrumentalists, does not blow its own trumpet too loudly, in fact it errs on the other side. There is no doubt that it is doing all that it claims to do for that section of the musical world which gives it its raison d'etre. We cordially wish our young and enterprising contemporary a long and useful career. We notice that at the commencement of the second volume several new features will be introduced, and that in future the magazine will be published at the beginning instead of the middle of the month.

With these engagements Dr. Bridge combines the appointment of Harmony Professor at the Royal College of Music. As a composer, Dr. Bridge has already taken high rank, in virtue chiefly of his Oratorio "Mount Moriah," a Cantata "Boadicea," his "Hymn to the Creator," produced at the Worcester Festival of 1884, "The Rock of Ages," produced at the last Birmingham Festival, and a fine overture full of dramatic power, "Morte d'Arthur." Dr. Bridge is also the author of theoretical works on counterpoint and organ accompaniment published in Novello's series of Music Primers.

I. From Our Own Outsider.

In the good old days, when we had a little fine weather in summer, or rather in early autumn, a crowd of enthusiastic, if in many cases impecunious, admirers of the divine art assembled round the Town Hall—some with their scores; some willing to pay for the "books of words," which, whether correct or otherwise, usually found a ready sale; some there because someone else was there; and some for no reason whatever. All, however, were "authorities" (more o have her own way in everything. Notwithstanding the pouring rain, the Town Hall presents an animated appearance, every place in the noble building being occupied, and according to present prospects, this should prove the best attended performance of the Festival. Among the noble visitors, are The President, His Grace the Duke of Norfolk, K.G., His Eminence Cardinal Newman, His Worship the Mayor of Birmingham (Alderman Maurice Pollack), and a large assembly of Vice-Presidents. Punctually to time, Dr. Hans Richter and the principal artistes make their appearance on the orchestra, amidst loud applause. The National Anthem, as is customary on these occasions, is sung by the full chorus, the soprano taking the first verse, then followed by the alto and full chorus and band. We have already stated how Mendelssohn's Elijah still holds its own, and those who were lucky enough to be present will endorse that opinion. It was a fine performance. The choruses, throughout, sang with a unity worthy of all praise, and notwithstanding the last two days' hard trial, the voices appeared fresh and full. Some objection might perhaps be taken to the tempi, and Dr. Richter, like the late Sir Michael Costa, has considerably changed the time of various choruses. The singing of Mr. Santley, one of the finest Elijahs of any period, was exquisitely pathetic and dramatic. "It is enough" touched the very hearts of his listeners, and his declamatory power has still the force of his younger years. Madame Albani, with an earnestness all her own, and an artistic charm which accompanied every phrase, sang superbly. "Lift thine eyes," sung by Madame Albani, Madame Trebelli, and Madame Patey, will long remain a delightful memento of the performance. Madame Patey's "O rest in the Lord" was a high triumph of vocal and dramatic art. Mr. E. Lloyd and Miss Anna Williams shared the honours in the first part. How divinely Mr. E. Lloyd sings "If with all your hearts," is well known to this nation. Madame Trebelli gave a charming reading of the air, "Woe unto them." The double quartetts received additional valuable help from Miss Ambler and Mr. Brereton, Mr. Foli and Mr. Piercy; and the accompaniments, under Dr. Richter's masterly bâton, were given with that delicacy and refinement for which he is noted. A word of commendation is due to our newly appointed organist, Mr. C. W. Perkins.

Tuesday Evening.

Dvoràk's Stabat Mater, the work by which perhaps posterity will know him best, was the chief feature of the first evening performance. Assuming that, as a matter of course, every one of your readers is more or less familiar with a work which has already made good its claim to rank as one of the masterpieces of the nineteenth century, I shall spare myself and them the description which, however valuable as copy to a daily paper, would only make needless inroads upon your limited space. Suffice it to say that every hearing reveals new beauties, especially when, as was the case this evening, the amplest means are brought to bear on the interpretation. Herders line, "Der seele schmerz wird durch rede leicht,"* is, it has always seemed to me, much more applicable to music than to speech, and no better example could be selected to illustrate this than Dvoràk's Stabat Mater. The opening chorus, "Stabat mater dolorosa," with its touching theme and delicious accompaniment, was faultlessly given, and indeed the same may be said of all the other numbers. Mr. Brereton, in his solo "Fac ut ardeat," scored a genuine success: he is an earnest singer, and a bright future lies before him. It is scarcely necessary to more than refer to Madame Albani's or Madame Trebelli's services, exceptionally brilliant though they were. The great soprano, as everyone knows, is never more successful than in music expressing religious fervour. Mr. Piercy also acquitted himself most satisfactorily; he had evidently made a special study of the music.

The renderings of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, and Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody"—works wide as the poles asunder!—will not soon be forgotten here. For finish, brilliancy, and delicacy, these two orchestral performances stand out as among the very finest ever heard in Birmingham. The noble "Oberon" overture, too, was played with delightful spirit and animation. Madame Albani's exquisite delivery of an air from Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda," and Signor Foli's familiar reading of Mozart's "Qui sdegno," formed the remaining items.

Wednesday.

The dismal weather of yesterday has given way to brilliant sunshine, and the noble hall this morning presented an animated appearance. Great expectations have been for some time past centred round "Judith," Dr. Parry's new work, composed expressly for this gathering. The verdict has been given, and this grand oratorio may now take its place among recognized favourites of its kind. Dr. Parry was loudly called for after the first and second acts and enthusiastically received by orchestra, band, and chorus—the ladies waving their handkerchiefs in just acclamation and appreciation of a truly earnest and powerful work. Dr. Richter conducted, and to him Dr. Parry whispered words of thanks, grasping his hands in grateful acknowledgment of his share in this unqualified success. Let me not omit to name the yeoman service rendered by the principal artists—Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Santley.

The combination of earnestness, depth, solidity, and charm which overspreads the whole melodic and harmonic texture of the work can scarcely fail to win the admiration of connoisseurs. Of real "Leitmotive," the principal is the "Moloch" motif, so effectively introduced in the chorus, "Hail, Moloch! Hail," with which the first scene closes. One of the finest numbers is the fugal chorus, "Our King is come again," and the final grand and magnificent choruses, "Arise! O Israel," and "Put off, O Jerusalem, the garment of thy mourning." The principal soprano part is well adapted to Miss Anna Williams' quality of voice, being rich and dramatically effective. That lady secured a triumph by her creation of the part of "Judith." Madame Patey had a most grateful task to fulfil, the music for the contralto demanding artistic as well as powerful declamation, both qualities which she possesses to a high degree. Scene No. 2. "The Children" is highly impressive, the two boys from Westminster Abbey giving valuable help in the concerted episode, which is in the form of a dialogue. Mr. Santley as the High Priest of Moloch had but a small task allotted to him, which he discharged in his customary conscientious manner. Mr. E. Lloyd, on the other hand, had some fine bravura airs and some luscious, melodious soli; as, for instance, the touching and most pathetic scene before the gates of Jerusalem. Dr. Parry has given to the world a mature work rich in scholarly treatment, highly effective instrumentation, and full of melody; and if occasionally reminiscences crop up reminding the musician of familiar phrases, Dr. Parry must be pardoned.

Want of space this week will not permit me to enter into further details, and it must suffice to state that the performance, especially of part of Act II, was distinguished by masterly execution, refinement, precision, and grandeur.

After the performance of Dr. Parry's Work, Mr. Stockley, the popular and worthy chorus master, occupied the conductor's desk, and Franz's psalm, "Praise ye the Lord," for double choir, unaccompanied, was superbly sung, the voices showing no sign of fatigue after their long morning's work. Haydn's Symphony in D, under Dr. Richter, concluded the long morning's concert. The symphony was worth remaining for, the little exaggerations in light and shade which appeared strange to us at the rehearsal were not observable, and a nobler and grander performance could not have been desired.

* "The heart's agony finds relief in speech."

From the "Morning Post."

The festival commenced this morning with the Oratorio "Elijah," written for Birmingham, and first produced on August 26, 1846, under the direction of the composer. The performance was noteworthy, inasmuch as it was, in fact, the first given after the termination of the period to which copyright extends in this country. The right of performance, which has never been maintained by the publishers from the first, would in ordinary course be now lapsed, and all who choose might be free to present the work in any place. But the well-known fastidiousness of the composer caused him to make alterations after the first performance, many of them of considerable importance; so that the "Elijah" now familiar to musical amateurs in the present day is not exactly the same as was heard on the memorable day in August in Birmingham forty-two years ago. Those who are reckoning upon flooding the market with reprints of the work, entire or in sections, will have to exercise a little patience before they can enter upon their calculations and specifications. The mere fact that the period limited by law as the existence of performing rights has expired does not determine the copyright or give freedom to all who wish to reproduce copies of a work. If the multiplication of copies is desirable, those who propose to benefit the public in this way must set to work in a manner conformable to the public desires. It would be of no use now to attempt to give incorrect copies of a work so well known that every note has become, as it were, classical. Those who would print an edition of "Elijah" as it was first performed would only be able to command a sale among the seekers after curiosities. For practical purposes only accurate reprints would be available, and, except by a careful reference to the original score they would not even be enabled to give to the world the original version, which is all they could do at present. The majority of the vast audience this morning were provided with the well known scores issued by the house of Novello and Co., and followed the text with serious patience, checking and marking every point. The performance was preceded by the National Anthem, according to Costa's arrangement of the simple melody, all the audience standing. The hall was not full, there being many vacant seats. The interest in the work has perhaps weakened, as far as the public of Birmingham are concerned, and the frequent opportunities for hearing it in the ordinary way here and elsewhere may possibly lessen the desire to hear it under such exceptional circumstances as those available at Birmingham at the Triennial Festival. Although there were empty places, the somewhat dangerous practice of blocking up the gangways in the galleries and on the floor by extemporised seats was continued, despite the frequent protests made from time to time against the practice. Beyond the inconvenience, there was no mishap attending this undesirable, and on the present occasion unnecessary, habit.

From the "Daily Telegraph."

About five o'clock this afternoon the rain did its worst—very bad it was—and then abated somewhat, out, I suppose, of sheer exhaustion, for a moment; indeed, the faint orange tints of a watery sunset could be seen in the sky. But these soon disappeared; and when the audience of the evening concert converged toward the Town Hall the aspect of things was dreary enough to confirm any wavering would-be suicide in his resolution to shuffle off this mortal coil. As soon as the persevering and undaunted public had come together within the now well-lit and cheerful building, it was discovered that many more could have found room, while persons accustomed to judge such matters had no difficulty in seeing that the hall had been well "papered." Dvorak's "Stabat Mater," famous work though it be, failed somehow to draw the Midland amateurs, who on that account are certainly to be commiserated, since not to admire the Bohemian composer's sacred masterpiece is to lack appreciation of a great thing. For my own part, the more I hear of that music the more profoundly am I impressed with its quality as a new revelation of the beautiful. Its originality is absolute, there is nothing like it anywhere, and assuredly the Latin hymn has no other setting that can compare with it in felicitous and powerful expression. Listening to Dvorak's music in this case, one must be impressed with its mysterious origin. Students of Schubert stand amazed at the divine stains poured forth by that representative of Philistine beer-drinking Vienna. The question is, "From whence hath this man these things?"—the old query put 1900 years ago, what time a Galilean peasant confounded the wisdow of the schools. So with Dvorak, who wrote his incomparable "Stabat" when poor and unknown, under circumstances into which "sweetness and light" did not enter, and amid difficulties that might well have kept him from soaring to these serene heights. Such phenomena confound us. They upset all our calculations and laugh at our theory of probabilities. But if we cannot comprehend we can admire and enjoy. We cannot tell whence this genius cometh nor whither it goeth, but we can hear the sound thereof, and that is no small thing. Dvorak's work received an excellent performance, the solos being carefully and well sung by Madame Albani, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Piercy, and Mr. Brereton, while both chorus and orchestra executed their share of the music in a manner that left no idea of the composer unexpressed, and none of his effects unattained. Occasionally, it is true, the attack of the choir was less prompt and decided than could have been wished, but some allowance must be made in connection with music so exacting and unconventional. Otherwise no reason for complaint appeared. The "Stabat" was followed by Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Liszt's Third Hungarian Rhapsody, the overtune to "Oberon," and a scena (Madame Albani) composed by Mr. Goring Thomas for an Italian version of "Esmeralda" which Mr. Lago was once minded to produce at Covent-garden, but did not.

THE CHURCH CANTATA.

A Paper read at the College of Organists, by ARTHUR TRICKETT, F.C.O.

The title of this paper was suggested to the writer by a variety of circumstances; including a perception of the readiness with which the church-going public avail themselves of opportunities of attending certain extra week-day services, the evident willingness shewn by church authorities to afford such opportunities, and an appreciation of the desirability of encouraging in every reasonable manner the occasional use of a special musical service.

Some such services we have already, the nature of which may be here briefly considered. First may be mentioned Organ Recitals, and much profit and enjoyment may be derived from this form of extra service, this term being applied advisedly, as the Organ Recital in church is now so frequently embodied in a form of service in which clergy, choir, and congregation actively participate. Next, allusion may be made to the use of a Cantata or Oratorio selection, in place of the Anthem; which, although in some respects defensible, is in a majority of cases to be deprecated, as without doubt, the right thing in the right place is an Anthem after the third Collect, as prescribed by the Prayer Book. Many of our grand old Anthems are none too well known, and the substitution of works of another character is of questionable propriety, to say the least. Let it not be thought that a desire is here expressed for the suppression of performances of Oratorios, etc., in church; or the contrary, such works should find a home in our churches, and in the hearts of the people from generation to generation; but not at the cost of the removal from their place, or even the temporary exclusion of those noble works upon which mainly rests our right to claim for ourselves an English School of Music. The argument is this: the services of the church are complete in themselves, and are well provided for musically; therefore, when an Oratorio, a Selection, or a Cantata is to be given, it should not be crushed into one of the existing service forms, but should have a special suitable form of service, in which it might appear as the central figure, or as the most prominent feature.

The performance of an Oratorio or a Cantata after Service is not free from objection, as generally the Service contains in itself as much as the majority of people care for at one sitting; and further, when the time arrives for the extra performance, the church may be fearfully hot, the singers jaded and faint, the organ abominably out of tune, and the congregation more disposed for a breath of fresh air than for settling down to listen to the singing of a series of musical numbers, given under conditions which are absolutely distressing.

The great oratorios of Handel, Bach, Haydn and Mendelssohn cannot be worthily rendered but by a first-rate choir strong enough to balance a complete orchestral band, which latter is a necessity; and however valiantly our enterprising choristers may strive to overcome the abounding difficulties, or however efficient the organist, as an organist, may be, the necessary volume of tone for due effect cannot be produced from an ordinary choir, nor can the orchestral effects be even approximately realised by the cleverest of organists. The mistake of trying to perform these works with the assistance of a small, incomplete amateur band is fully demonstrated by the harrowing mysteries occasionally perpetrated in the way of accompaniments under such an arrangement. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," now so frequently performed in our churches, is a work that cannot be worthily given without a band, and a good band too; and to do this Symphony Cantata minus the Symphony, as is often the case, is to give an incomplete performance of a work, strongly suggestive of "Hamlet without Hamlet." These great compositions are best left in the hands of those that have the means of rendering them worthily and completely.

It has been said with regard to our national love for Oratorio, that the English people wanted the Bible set to music, and it is perfectly true that most of the chief incidents of the Bible have been musically treated. Why not go a step further, and apply the same treatment to the various seasons of the Church by the production of a series of Church Cantatas suitable to particular Fasts, Festivals, and Saints' days? As a rule, it will be found that an organist of any standing is quite capable of selecting words and composing suitable music for the purpose in question; also of instructing his forces and carrying his ideas into effect; and it may be assumed that he might in a majority of cases rely upon the co-operation of his fellow church officers. The materials for the book of words for any subject chosen will be readily found on reference to three books, Hymn Book, Prayer Book and Bible. For possible guidance, an outline scheme for a Church Cantata for Whitsuntide is given:—

Hymn, "When God of old came down from Heaven."
Part I., Mount Sinai. The Prophecy.
Hymn, "Come, Thou Holy Spirit, come."
Part II., The Promise of a Comforter.
Hymn, "Gracious Spirit, Heavenly Dove."
Part III., The Fulfilment of the Prophecy and of the Promise.
Hymn, "To Thee, O Comforter Divine."

With regard to the music little need be said, except, perhaps, that it should not be made too difficult for ordinary choirs; and as the Church is richly provided for in the way of Services and Anthems, to indicate to Church composers a new field of labour well worthy of exploration.

The special form of Service recommended for use with the Cantata is as follows:—

1. Collects and other Prayers.
2. Some Versicles and Responses.
4. A Psalm, chanted.
4. A Homily on the same subject as the Cantata.
5. The Cantata.
6. Collects and Benediction.

Although we have great works suitable to different seasons and Saints' Days, such as "The Messiah," "The Last Judgment," "The Christmas Oratorio," "The Light of the World," The Passion Music of Bach, Handel, Haydn, and Spohr, "The Redemption," "St. Paul," "St. Peter," "St. John the Baptist," etc.; there appears to be a peculiar dearth of smaller works of a similar nature, suitable for ordinary choirs; Dr. Stainer's "Crucifixion," and "Daughter of Jairus," and Farmer's "Christ and His Soldiers," notwithstanding. The Cantatas of Bach, and the Chandos Anthems of Handel, being out of the question, if only on account of their difficulty.

This paper must now conclude by asking the attention of all concerned to the question of the more general introduction into our churches of a special form of service for week-day use, which shall include a Church Cantata, to be sung with suitable accompaniments.

THE LATE DR. DYKES ON CHURCH MUSIC.

We know that Guidetti, under the auspices of the great Palestrina, revised the plain song for the Western Church in the sixteenth century, he admitted only twenty-three of the chants, which from time to time have been in use, as ancient and legitimate: five forms of the first tone, one of the second, four of the third, three of the fourth, one of the fifth, one of the sixth, five of the seventh, two of the eighth, and the beautiful irregular or Peregrine tone. Can any Psalm chants be more grave, vigorous, and pleasing than most of these? Surely the mere interest attaching to them, independently of their intrinsic excellence, should make us loth to part with them. But are we to use them exclusively? "Of course you are," say many, "You cannot serve God and Mammon." All compromises are bad: a compromise between Anglicans and Gregorians intolerable. Those who so speak know little of the practical difficulties with which this subject is beset. I will mention a few. And first, if you adhere to the pure recognized forms of the Gregorian tones, you have at most twenty-three chants for the whole Psalter; but several of these are simply varieties of the same chant, and so like one to another that it is confusing to your people to teach them both. So you have only some dozen fresh forms of melody for the whole book of Psalms; and the result is, that you become so weary with the iteration that you are driven to some method for enriching your stock. Two methods have been adopted, the mediæval and the Anglican. We must determine for ourselves which is the most sensible. The mediæval method, already referred to, was to restrict the Psalm chants to these nine tones alone; not to construct new and original melodies, according to the laws of the ecclesiastical modes, but to keep to this limited number of melodies—one representative tune for each mode or scale. And yet, while professedly doing this, while professedly adhering to the nine old orthodox chants, and them alone, practically to increase their number almost indefinitely by submitting each individual chant to every conceivable kind of usage; putting here a new beginning, here a new middle, here a new end; inserting a few notes here, omitting a few notes there, till one chant became twenty or fifty, as the case might be. The method adopted by the Anglican Church for supplying itself with suitable chants according to its needs, was not to ring any fresh changes on the old tones, or torture them into any new forms, but to fix on some simple type or pattern, leaving it to her musicians to construct chants according to that type, embodying the spirit of the old church melodies and based upon the Gregorian system, but adapted to the accent and genius of the English language and susceptible of legitimate harmony. I am not speaking a word in disparagement of the old Gregorian chants. Their varying rhythms and quaint cadences I dearly love. To hear them well and intelligently sung and accompanied is to myself a great treat. But it is mere blind idolatry which refuses to see the practical value of the other system of chanting. 1st. Anglican chants give us what we really want, a greater and more legitimate variety than Gregorians. 2nd. They present fewer difficulties: (1) less difficulty in pointing, and (2) less difficulty in accompanying. (1) Less difficulty in pointing: The rhythms and metres of the Gregorian chants are so different, that a Psalm pointed to suit one chant will not suit another. These changes of rhythm are very pleasing, but create great practical difficulties; for you cannot have your Psalter pointed once for all and then select your chants. You must have each Psalm pointed for its own chant. This cripples one very much. (2) But the difficulty in accompanying is also great. The structure of most of the chants is really inconsistent with such a tonal system as the laws of harmony demand, and, therefore, how best to clothe them with organ harmonies is a great problem. Take, for instance, the fourth tone. Who really knows how to harmonize this? And to hear an unskilled organist labour through it, with harmonies utterly crude and irrational, is no small penance to musical ears. I have occasionally heard the Gregorian chants very finely accompanied. But generally, the practical difficulties which attend their successsful rendering are so imperfectly overcome, that the Psalms, which should form one of the most delightful parts of the service, become a very "pain and grief." The choir and congregation may bawl out at the top of their voices; still one too often feels that the music is not such as the words of the sweet Psalmist merit, or such as is fit for an offering to God. Now, the Anglican system obviates both the difficulties I have mentioned. Instead of twenty different rhythms or metres, it has, with practical good sense, fixed on one—the most common, and perhaps most satisfactory of all the ancient ones, and the best adapted to the general requirement of our language; a rhythm (as those who take interest in mystic numbers will be pleased to observe) having a sevenfold division—the former half of the chant containing three, the latter four members. So that you have your Psalter pointed once for all; and any chant will suit any Psalm. And thus, provided you can obtain a collection of good chants (which, with a little pains, you may easily do), you may go far towards securing a very satisfactory musical rendering of the daily Psalms. For we ought not, I think, to keep one Psalm rigidly to one chant (except, perhaps, the 114th to the beautiful Peregrine tone); for the Psalter is so prolific in meaning, each Psalm has so many faces, that even our music should not seem to teach that it has only one. Circumstances may occur, particular festivals come round, which may render it desirable to bring out one or other aspect of a Psalm into prominence; a judicious change of chant will often aid you in this. And our best Anglican single chants are so very simple and straightforward that a congregation will catch one almost directly. I may mention that although the Gregorian chants, as a rule, suffer by being adapted to our Anglican mode of pointing, requiring a somewhat freeer treatment, still many of the best of them, and certain forms of all of them, may be sung to our common Anglican division of the words. (3) In connection with harmony, I must not omit to notice another advantage which our English chants possess. Being written in modes which invite harmony, they are naturally susceptible of it. Now, harmonized music is (as I have before said) essentially Christian. It is of an intrinsically higher order than unisonous, and surely pure vocal harmony is the most appropriate music for the sanctuary, and the most perfect and fitting offering to Him from whom all harmony proceeds. Why the Psalms, which should be the most delightful part of our ordinary morning and evening offices, should be always condemned to be sung (sometimes, I should say, howled) in unison I cannot tell. My idea is this, that our English chants should be so constructed (as numbers of them are) as, first, to be independent of any organ accompaniment; and, second, to bear unisonous as well as harmonized singing; so that their effect shall be not impaired, but rather enhanced by the congregation singing the melody in unison and octaves. By this means those who preferred it may sing the air, and those whose ears or voices prompted them to contribute to the harmony, may join in one of the vocal parts. This is an important consideration. Unisonous is very painful to some voices. Alto voices especially dislike it. They are constantly compelled to sing out of their proper register; and this, I doubt not, is one of the secret personal reasons for the objection entertained by my valued friend the Oxford Professor against Gregorian music. He feels himself excluded from participating in an important part of the office. Moreover, it is ruinous to a choir always to sing in unison. The singing soon becomes coarse and harsh, and degenerates into mere shouting. The trebles lose the power of singing in tune when unsustained by others. The tenors lose their higher, the basses their lower notes; the altos their voices altogether; everything becomes dependent on the organ. If you have a clever organist the mischief will be veiled; the incompetence of the choir will not be very apparent, and the service will probably be considered a very good one, for a clever organist has much in his power. But if you lose him, woe betide your choir. My belief is, that our choirs throughout the country have sensibly deteriorated since the revival of so much unisonous singing. And they will deteriorate. It saves trouble; it prevents the necessity of any man or boy knowing how to sing; but it results in offering to God a maimed and imperfect offering. Now, I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am not speaking against Gregorian chants. I love to hear them well done, and to join in them; but the universal adoption of them, advocated by many, is beset with difficulties so serious, which I have not by any means exhausted—difficulties which our simple Anglican system, with practical good sense, evades—that I cannot think it right to pass them over without notice; as they are by no means sufficiently recognised. There is a kind of weak sentimental dread of everything Anglican among some of our brethren, which warps their judgment. Call a chant "Parisian," and be it never so weak and modern, it will be eagerly appropriated. Call it English, and be it never so good, it will be held in contempt. "Debased" is the epithet we usually see applied to Anglican chants in certain of our Church newspapers, and by certain of our advanced writers. Such language is mere nonsense. I am not about to offer any private theory of my own with respect to chanting. We must go on making trials, and gather experience. My feeling is that we should, if possible, appropriate and utilize both classes of chants; either incorporating the best of the ancient ones into our modern system, or employing both systems according to our need. The Church, like a wise householder, brings forth from her exhaustless treasury "things new and old." The question of Psalm chanting is one of great and growing interest to us. No Church in Christendom makes such congregational uses of the Psalter as our own; and this use, please God, will increase. The Psalter and offices are recited privately and claustrally elsewhere, but not in the great congregation. We are bound, therefore, to look for music which will suit congregational worship—music simple, broad, and susceptible of harmony. It is because so much of the mediæval plain song, with its long vocal flourishes and wearisome multiplication of notes to one syllable, is so unsuited for congregational use, that I regret to see the attempts made to introduce so much of it into our services, especially into the Communion office. A single priest or small choir of men singing in unison, accompanied, as we often heard them abroad, with an ophicleide, may perform such music well enough, and not without effect. But to attempt to force music of this character on a congregation of English worshippers is, I am convinced, a great and serious mistake. I know nothing more wearying, more utterly painful to musical ears, than to hear some of these modern and most ill-judged adaptations. I forbear to specify instances. So again, there is something fascinating in singing a hymn tune with a pretty Latin title, and written in square notes; and I freely own that a few of these revived Latin tunes are well worthy of adoption, susceptible of pure harmony, simple, vigorous, and pleasing; and that most of them possess an interest for the antiquarian and musician; but I must express my candid opinion with regard to the majority of them, that to inflict them on a congregation is sheer, downright cruelty. From the earliest ages, the hymns of the Church have been regarded as in some sort a permitted outlet for Christian feeling and enthusiasm, and have claimed for themselves music of a somewhat more free and popular character than the Psalms. In the Psalms, Christian truths are in a measure veiled and indirectly expressed; in the Church hymns they are directly announced "in all their gracious and heart-stirring fulness." Now to wed these hymns to archaic strains, uncouth, unrhythmical, inharmonious, devoid of all power to move the people's hearts, is a great error. Our hymns and anthems, while devout and ecclesiastical in character, should be at least pleasing and soberly expressive, so that they may really be a help, not a hindrance to the words with which they are associated. In conclusion, the lecturer said, I must apologise for the length, and yet great incompleteness of this paper. I have aimed at bringing before you a few of the principles of choral worship, rather than at dealing much with details. Our aim should be to keep our music simple and congregational, and yet of such a character as shall be consistent with our increased musical knowledge, with which God has blessed us above our ancestors. There is a great revival going on in the Church of England—musical, ritual, devotional. I believe it to be of God, and that no power on earth can arrest it. If the Church is to win back her masses, she must not refuse to avail herself of any legitimate means of which God may have signified His approval, for rendering her service soberly attractive. May God give us all wisdom in our several departments of study and spheres of influence, to contribute towards this revival in such a way as shall best promote the edification of His people and His own honour and glory.

MODERN ORGAN PLAYING.

In turning over the pages of a contemporary, the following words, written twenty years ago, were found. There is a ring of common sense in them which justifies their re-appearance; especially as the danger of organic imitation of orchestral effects is not yet past away, though it has undergone a wise modification of late. "In the matter of organ playing—especially solo playing—a very remarkable change has taken place within the last few years. All observant persons must have remarked the aim of organ builders to imitate more and more closely the tones of orchestral instruments in their work. This would certainly not call for censure, did they not very frequently forget that an organ is not an orchestra, and entirely overlook its radical peculiarities. It is quite certain that—howclever soever the orchestral imitations may be, how able the performer called upon to manipulate—the organ makes a very imperfect imitation of the orchestra, an imitation so imperfect that we wonder any should attempt to encourage the comparison. This is the greater matter for wonder because no great composer for the instrument has ever, so far as we know, tried to produce the imitation in his compositions. As there are distinctive peculiarities belonging to an organ, so there are distinctive features in its music. It may be advanced that the practice of adapting orchestral works to the organ has in some sort necessitated the production of instruments different from the genuine organ; and that if composers have not attempted orchestral effects in their writings, there is no lack of arrangements in every sense of the word orchestral. But what effect do these produce? Experience has convinced us that the essential peculiarities of the organ cannot be safely ignored even in arrangements, and that in proportion as they are ignored so do the transgressing arrangements become ineffective and useless. The mere transcript of a composer's score counts for very little; an arranger should be able clearly to keep in view the peculiarities alike of the score before him and the instrument for which he is writing; and he who is unable to transfer the spirit of the one to the forms of the other had better leave arrangement alone. There is rather a fondly cherished delusion abroad that the very figures and notes of a composer should appear in any transcript of his work. This is no doubt a very nice idea; but unfortunately for it, as different men have different ways of expressing the same thought, so have the instruments of a band each a method of its own in the production of sound. Now in transferring any of these orchestral figures to the organ the character of that instrument should be considered, and in proportion to that consideration will be the excellence of the arrangement."—Since these words appeared a large amount of original organ music has been written in which orchestral idioms are employed, modified, and endowed with organic instincts. Then the work of the College of Organists, not to add the increased attention paid to the study of the organ in our musical institutions devoted to educational purposes, has told greatly in the propagation of a good, sound, yet picturesque style of organ-playing. All the same, it is well to turn our attention now and then to a consideration of artistic or fashionable tendencies, towards which we may consciously or unconsciously drift from time to time.

SPECIFICATIONS.

CATFORD, KENT.

PEDAL ORGAN (CCC to F, 30 Notes).—Open Diapason, Violone, Bourdon, Violoncello.

COUPLERS.—Swell to Great, Swell to Pedals, Great to Pedals, Choir to Pedals, Swell Super-Octave, Tremulant to Swell. Three Composition Pedals to Great; three Composition Pedals to Swell. Pedal to act on Great to Pedals.

RECITAL NEWS.

LIVERPOOL.—Recitals by Mr. W. T. Best, at St. George's Hall, on August 16th and 18th: Capocci's Preghiera e Gran Coro Trionfale; Mendelssohn's Adagio in A major, from the Third Symphony; Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G major; Best's Scherzo for the Organ in A minor; Rossini's Chorus, "La Fede"; Mozart's Overture, "Idomeneo"; Klein's Offertoire in E flat major; Raff's Serenade in A major, Op. 75; Capocci's Scherzo and Finale; Bach's Toccata con Fuga in D minor; Hatton's Scherzo in F sharp minor; Flotow's Overture, "Sofia Caterina."

GLASGOW.—Recital given by Dr. A. L. Peace, in the Cathedral, on August 21st: Hasse's Organ Concerto, No. 4; Beethoven's Adagio (Septet); Mendelssohn's Prelude in E minor and Fugue with Corale in E minor, from the Pianoforte Works; Selection from Rossini's "Moses in Egypt"; Chorus, "Hope's Rosy Morning"; Duet, "Fly Me Not"; Choral March, "Great Queen of Earth"; Prayer, "To Thee, Great Lord"; Morandi's Offertorio in F minor and major.

GREAT YARMOUTH.—At the Parish Church, on August 23rd, the following music was performed by Dr. Mann, F.C.O. (Organist of King's College, Cambridge), on the organ, in aid of the fund for the completion of the organ: -Concerto in G minor (Adagio—Allegro—Adagio—Gavotte), M. Camidge; Andante in A flat (from Sonata No. 3), Merkel; Overture to "Otho," Handel; Andante in F sharp minor, S. S. Wesley; Fugue in E flat (S. Ann's), Bach; Andante in D minor (from Sonata Op. 28), Beethoven; Concerto in B flat (Largo—Allegro—Gavotte), M. Hawdon.

KIDDERMINSTER.—On July 29th an Organ Recital was given in the Town Hall, Kidderminster, by Mr. Arthur S. Gorman, of West Bromwich. Programme: First Sonata, Mendelssohn; Melody in A flat, Guilmant; Offertoire in A minor, Batiste; Romance, arranged from the works of Gounod, Lindsay Sloper; Fugue in G minor, J. S. Bach; Andante in A, Hy. Smart; Meditation in a Cathedral, E. Silas; Offertoire in E minor, Batiste; Andante Tranquillo, from Third Sonata, Mendelssohn; "Hallelujah Chorus" (by request) Handel.

ASHTON.—On Sunday, August 6th, Mr. C. M. Bailey, F.C.O. (late of Standish, and now Deputy-Organist of Ripon Cathedral), presided at the organ at Holy Trinity Church. After each service Mr. Bailey gave a short recital on the organ, the following being the pieces selected:—After Morning Service: Adagio in B flat, Alexander; Fugue in B minor, J. S. Bach; Intermezzo, A. Macbeth; Offertoire in F, Batiste. After Evening Service: Concert Stück, Dr. Spark; Romanza in G, Beethoven; Adagio in D, Mozart; "Zadock, the Priest," Handel.

Notes.

According to the Hand-book of American Music and Musicians, the first organ built in America was constructed at Boston by Edward Broomfield, in 1745. An organ (though only a small one of one manual and six stops) was built in Christ Church, Boston, in 1752. Early in the present century organ-building became more general, one Henry Pratt, of Winchester, New Hampshire, having alone built fifty. Since those days Americans have made great strides in organ-building, as in everything else, musical and otherwise, and the best builders in the States can compete with our leading English firms. In tone the American organs have much of German character, though endowed with the variety and mechanical powers of English instruments.

Among the new works by English composers to be performed for the first time at the Birmingham Festival is an organ-piece between the first and second parts of the "Messiah" on the Thursday morning. Mr. Perkins will play this, a new offertoire for organ by Mr. J. F. Barnett. The new Birmingham organist will be heard, doubtless, to advantage in this work. Its introduction recalls the organ concertos of Handel's own day, and, to be more local, the solo performances at Birmingham between oratorio parts by Mendelssohn, Neukomm, E. T. Chipp, Sims, and others during the organistship of Mr. James Stimpson.

A writer in Church Bells observes:—"Most of the hymns for harvest in Ancient & Modern and Church Hymns are especially suited for use during the operations of harvest, and yet how seldom are they so used! There is a prevailing custom, which is, apparently, still on the increase, of simply using the harvest hymns at the 'Thanksgiving' service only, at which many worshippers cannot be present, and so have no opportnnity of joining in the harvest hymns. This, I think, is a great pity; harvest hymns ought to be sung during harvest, and not simply at a special service, frequently as late as October or even November."

The Rev. J. Julian, vicar of Wincobank, Sheffield, is reported to have offered to the Council of the Church House the whole of the very large and valuable collection of books and MSS. which he has accumulated in the preparation of the Dictionary of Hymnology, which Mr. Murray is about to publish. The offer has been gratefully accepted by the Council. The collection will form the nucleus of a Department for Hymnology in connection with the library of the Church House.

Mr. Charles J. Dunphie says in one of his essays:—"Many a weak play has been pulled through by a strong snowstorm, more particularly at night, and in the neighbourhood of a church, at the time the moon shines softly upon the spectral white of the landscape, and the lights inside the sacred edifice glow richly through the painted windows, while the bells are ringing dolefully, or the organ is pealing in solemn strains." The effect of the organ in the theatre has been already spoken of at length in these columns. The essayist here quoted, recognises a strange human perversity, by which things out of place apparently strike the mind with exceptional power.

In Dr. Langdon Colborne's new Oratorio "Samuel," the Church Oratorio principle—the introduction of Hymn Tunes, as in the manner of Bach and as in Mendelssohn's "St. Paul"—is largely recognised in a truly English fashion. The tunes introduced are St. Ann's, Bedford, Hanover, and a graceful modern tune by Dr. E. J. Hopkins. The work will be first performed at Hereford Cathedral on the Sunday preceding the Festival.

LETTER III. (concluded).

I have only now to add, on the subject of this air, and I should be sorry from what I have said of the ornament essential to it, to have given rise to an opinion in your Lordship, which the general practice of singers is, I own, but too apt to confirm, namely, that the cantabile is little else than a string of flourishes, originating almost entirely in the caprice of the performer. This is very far from being the case: Though the melancholy expressed by the cantabile be of that soothing kind which the mind loves to indulge, and is, therefore, not incompatible with some exertions of the fancy, yet are these exertions clearly limited, both with respect to number and quality, by the sense of the words; some admit of more, some of less ornament. The expression of tenderness, as has been already observed, is that which peculiarly characterises this air; and just in proportion as this expression is allied to sentiments of hope or pleasure, or tends rather towards sadness and despondency, it admits more or less of being ornamented.—As to the exact quantum, no precise rules can be given:—This, it is evident, must always depend on the nice judgment of the performer; and it is certain, that, the greater his feeling, and the more correct his taste, the more sparing he will be in the application of embellishments.—Those he makes use of, will resemble in kind and number, not those ornaments which, without distinction, overload the whole surface of a Gothic building, but those with which the Greeks adorned their architecture, which, in times of the purest taste, were never so many as to disguise, in any degree, the appearance of simplicity, nor so prominent as to disturb the symmetry of the great component parts of the edifice. Having mentioned architecture, a very striking analogy presents itself to me between the Corinthian order and the aria cantabile.

As in this order it appears evidently to have been the intention of the inventor to unite, as far as they are confident with each other, beauty and utility: so it seems the object of the cantabile to unite, in the same manner, beauty and expression. Thus, elegance and refinement are equally the character of both,—in both have the same kind of limitation; in the former, any thing, however beautiful in itself, that militated against utility, would have been inadmissible;—in the latter, any ornament, however graceful in itself, that ran counter-to, or, in the least, diminished the expression, would be unpardonable;—for utility is the first principle of architecture, and expression is the great end of music. This analogy might be carried a great deal farther, but I am afraid I have already exhausted your Lordship's patience.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The classical programme on Wednesday was admirably chosen, and the enormous audience which it attracted should silence all scepticism with regard to the drawing powers of that which is best of its kind. Let it once be clearly demonstrated that not only Shakespeare but even "Classical" music can be made to "pay"—the great test of merit in at least one country under the sun—and the paltry concoctions which have made our name a byword among the nations will soon become a drug in the market. The concert opened with that greatest of all overtures, the incomparable "Leonora" (No. 3). Beethoven's tremendous imaginings were interpreted with spirit and an unusual degree of precision, the famous tornado for the violins leading to the coda being especially well done.

Mr. Arthur Friedheim gave a good solid rendering of the same master's "Emperor" Concerto (No. 5—not "No. 4" as stated in the programme) but, with the exception of a very delicate pianissimo, his style is somewhat wanting in reverence and poetic charm. He is, however, not a "Nasmyth Hammermann" and that is something to be thankful for! That he made a favourable impression upon his audience, they amply testified. The greatest enthusiasm, however, was reserved for Mr. Carrodus and Miss Nikita, who were heard respectively in Spohr's "Concerto Dramatique" and Gounod's "Ave Maria" (on Bach's Prelude). The Symphony, Mozart's "Jupiter," was well and carefully played, the slow movement with adequate impressiveness, and the last with characteristic fire. Mr. Orlando Harley was heard in "If with all your hearts," from "Elijah," and Mr. Lewis Thomas was artistic and helpful, as usual, in the accompaniments.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.—Another of the very popular open-air Concerts (Baden-Baden) was given on Monday evening, August 27th, the whole of the front of the Palace, terrace, and slope being illuminated with coloured lamps and the electric light. There was a full orchestra, and the vocalists were Madame Clara West, Miss Lottie West, and Messrs. B. Beresford and W. Martin. The Concert was under the direction of Mr. T. W. Henderson.

ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS.

You are kindly requested to write for Ainsworth's "New Patent Organ Pedal Combination List." Ainsworth's "New Patent" is perfectly unique and may be combined easily with any Piano. It is the only one which may be safely combined with any Piano without deteriorating the instrument. Having put down at my works two engines and machinery of the most desirable kind, I am now supplying my goods at a price which enables every organist and organ student to have always ready for use in his Studio an

ORGAN PEDAL PIANO,

AFFORDING PERFECTLY UNIQUE PEDAL PRACTICE.

34, Sheen Park, Richmond.

DEAR SIR,—I have deferred writing to comment upon your Pedals and Action now attached to my pianoforte until I could satisfy myself of their utility and efficiency. I can now conscientiously say that they more than fulfil all my anticipations. Although I am no carpenter, aided by your lucid diagram I had little difficulty in attaching them myself, and it is impossible to over-estimate the comfort they give to me, or to conceive the saving of time one experiences in one's own room.—Believe me, yours truly,

To Mr. Ainsworth. BURNHAM HORNER, F.R. Hist. S.

DEAR SIR,—It gives me great pleasure to bear testimony to the perfection of your invention. I am more than satisfied with your Patent Action and Organ Pedals, and consider them worth double the money. Organists and organ students who desire to improve in the Art of Pedalling, which is so essential to a good organist, will do well to procure a set. I have seen no Action half so effective, and one can sit at the piano and play, "Fixed in his everlasting seat," or any other organ music or organ arrangement, with the greatest pleasure. The touch of pedals could not be better, and the action is, as you say, "Absolutely free from annoyances." They cannot be too highly recommended, as by their use, rapid progress is certain.—Believe me, sincerely yours, I. B. THORNTON,
Organist, Birstall, Leeds.

Cologne, July 16th, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have much pleasure in informing you that your Pedals have given the fullest satisfaction. I have them combined with my practice piano. Many of my musical friends who have seen them, as well as my organ pupils, are quite delighted with them; and I must acknowledge that I have never met with any Pedals so noiseless and pleasant to play upon as yours. The Action I consider durable, and of very good workmanship. Every organist who desires to perfect his playing will welcome your invention. I can recommend your goods in every respect.—Yours truly, HERR J. RODENKIRCHEN.

To John Ainsworth, Esq. Organist, The Cathedral, Cologne, Germany.

TOOLS.—In order to facilitate the attachment, a complete set of tools are sent (four in number), each one marked for its particular use. By the use of these tools, and following carefully the directions, ANY ONE can make a really good attachment.

beauty. The "Roi d'Ys" will be succeeded by Bizet's "Pêcheurs de Perles," Litolff's "Escadron volant de la Reine," M. Lalo's "Dante et Béatrix," and finally Massenet's new opera, "Esclarmonde," which is said to surpass all the composer's previous efforts.

Mons. Planquette having recently arrived in England, will put the finishing touches to his new opera, "Paul Jones," and superintend the preparations for its production, a few months hence, at the Prince of Wales' Theatre.

Dr. Parry's "Judith" will be given by the Novello Choir on December 6th, and, under the direction of the composer, at the Crystal Palace on December 15th.

We know a military man who complains that he has no "ear for music." He says he only recognizes two tunes—one is "God Save the Queen," and the other isn't!

Mr. Charles Woolhouse will almost immediately publish a "Treatise on Musical Intervals, Temperament, and the Elementary Principles of Music," by W. S. B. Woolhouse, F.R.A.S., &c. The first edition of this work having been out of print for some time, the publication of a second will be doubly welcome. Mr. Woolhouse's style is, though scholarly, perfect clear—no small recommendation in a book of this kind. The headings of the different divisions of the book are as follows:—Sound; Intervals; Temperament; Harmonics; Beats of Imperfect Concords; True Intonation Scales; Chords; and miscellaneous additions. We like th author's definition of sound immensely; "Sound is affection of the mind, produced by the action of ra vibratory motions on the organ of hearing." The italics ours.

THE CHARITY CONCERT.

FROM THE FRENCH OF JULES SANDEAU.

"You, my friend, who were acquainted with her, know that for a long time we shall not see her like. She remains in our memory as one of the most charming and brilliant figures of our time. She had the genius, beauty, and youth, with the grace and goodness which make one forgive greatness. She shot through our sky like a star, but one can still see the shining track left in her passage. Since it pleases you to hear of her, and all that concerns her memory has an attraction always pleasant, always new, I will tell you how it was permitted me to see her for the first time.

"It is many years since then. I was young, and scarcely knew my own village. A friend of my family, who had a great affection for me, had spoken of taking me to the south of France, whither business connected with an inheritance called him, and it was thought that, before launching me into life, it would not be a bad thing to make me see a little of the world. Accordingly I set out one lovely April morning, in company with this friend Jacques, in a little tilted cart which, as a matter of fact, served as a post-chaise, drawn by a little mare with legs like iron, whom her master called Bergère. You can guess what an enchanted voyage that seemed! Spring everywhere, in me, round me: as on the earth, so in my heart, all broke into blossom and whispering leaf, and my sixteen years mingled their music with the warbling of the birds in the woods.

"We went by short stages, in the fashion of vetturini, setting out at sunrise, taking our meals at random, going to bed at evening, by the grace of God. But be reassured, my dearest, you need not fear that I shall bore you with any new traveller's 'impressions.' I have never been counted amongst those senseless and babbling pilgrims, who go knocking from door to door, and shake the dust of their sandals on all hearths, to say—what? They are happy people; the unexpected springs up under their very feet; the fantastic and the picturesque travel with them; they are fated travellers, who, between Paris and Saint-Cloud, find material for writing an Odyssey. With myself, my friend, things are quite otherwise; and I seriously believe that I could make the tour of the world without seeing even the tail of an adventure. I have travelled on foot, on horseback, in a carriage; hurled like an arrow by steam, I have descended rivers; like Hannibal I have scaled the Alps; like the pious Æneas, I have sailed over the blue sea; ocean has borne me on her shining bosom. Ah, well! I confess it in all humility, nothing strange or romantic has happened to me; on the ocean I have had fair winds and peaceful sea; on land, nothing more dramatic than the incidents of the landscape; and before me always the certain and proven sense of reality, stretching out as hard and naked as the lines of the railway. The departures at morning in the fresh crisp air; the halts at mid-day; the excursions to some old ruins; the greeting exchanged with the peasant, going to the town or returning to his hamlet; the silent communings of the soul with nature; the dreams told only to the passing cloud; the friendly chance encounters; the arrival at the hostelry at night; the reception by the host, the curiosity, and sometimes the sympathy aroused by the sight of a strange and youthful face—these are, to tell truth, the solemn incidents which up till now have distinguished my travels; and such, in a word, is the story of my first campaign, except, indeed, the incident which I will relate to you.

"My friend Jacques spoke but little. Between sunrise and sunset he smoked fifteen or twenty pipes, and spent the rest of the time in sleep. Bergère did from eight to ten leagues a day, more or less, according to the stages. All was new to me, and all charmed me, except perhaps the towns we passed, which all seemed horrible. I used to ask myself if it were really possible that beings, organized like Jacques and myself, consented of their own free will to drag out their lives in these hideous dens, which I proudly compared with my own birthplace. Ah, charm of one's country! Strange power of the places in which our childhood has glided away! Magic of that corner of the earth in which our eyes were first opened to the light of heaven! I well remember meeting, some years ago, in a diligence, a pupil of the College of Saint-Louis, who for the first time for five years was going to spend his holidays with his family. Despite the difference in our ages, we speedily conceived a friendship for each other. He was a pleasant young fellow, almost a child still, excitable, emotional, and gentle. He spoke to me with a childish joy of his mother, his two sisters, of the country where he was born, and which he was going to re-visit after five years' absence. It pleased me to hear him; in listening, I was carried back with a wistful happiness to the sweet days of my youth. We were mounting a steep hill on foot, and as we reached the top, I could not help crying out, on surveying the landscape spread at our feet. The effect was marvellous: woods diapered with a thousand hues; hills crowned with vines, reddened by autumn; the river crimsoned with the sunset; villages with wreaths of curling smoke; the steeples piercing the thin leafage; the shadows of the poplars stretching out on the grass; and, rising to us from the valley, all the scents, and sounds, and harmonies of evening. My boy tossed his head.

"'If you wish to see something beautiful,' he said, 'you should come with me to Fresnes.'

"'What is Fresnes?' I asked.

"'Fresnes,' he answered, 'is the place I am going to, the place where I was born, where my mother and sisters wait for me.'

"'And is it beautiful?'

"'Yes, it is a little beautiful,' he said, with a fine smile.

"'Have you woods there?'

"'Woods?—Forests.'

"'Water?'

"'A lake, a river.'

"'Hills?'

"'You might call them mountains!'

"'That must indeed be a beautiful country,' I said.

"The rest of the day we talked only of Fresnes. On the following morning, the diligence stopped for relays at the door of the 'Golden Lion,' in a wretched town called, I think, Saint-Maixent, about a couple of leagues from Fresnes; it was there that my young friend and I were to separate. A servant was awaiting him there, with two horses. The conductor having announced that the coach, by some wickedness of the management, would stop at Saint-Maixent for four hours, I agreed to the entreaties of my young comrade, and decided to accompany him to his family domain. I was curious to see this Eden, and to carry its image in my memory. I accordingly mounted the servant's horse, and we set out at a gallop. We went through a country that was flat, naked, dry, and gloomy; but I comforted myself with dreams of Vaucluse, at which one arrives as by enchantment, on turning a barren rock. At last, after an hour's gallop, our horses stopped at the end of a village, before a wooden palisade, painted green; my companion threw himself from the saddle, fell into the arms of three women who were weeping for joy, and for some minutes there was a scene of embracing which no human words can describe. Much affected, I looked curiously around for the lake and river, the mountains and forests. To speak plainly, it was a horrible country. When the first transports were spent, the boy took me by the hand.

"'See,' he said, with tearful eyes; 'here are our forests, our mountains, and yonder our lake and river. Was I not right yesterday? Do you know anything in the world more beautiful?'

"I opened my eyes wider, to see the better. The lake was a pond, in which a dozen ducks paddled; the river, a thread of impure water; the forest, a cluster of oaks with leaves torn more by caterpillars than by the autumn; the mountains, a few pieces of rock half ruined by the miners. Ah! charm of one's native country!—so I cried to myself; and you yourself, my dear Augustus, under the blue Italian sky, amongst the orange-trees of the river of Genoa, have you not sometimes thought regretfully of the scent of your apple-trees in blossom, your house by the Seine, your orchard close? Have you forgotten to look for the spire of your village, the spire already historic, which you in turn must make more illustrious?"

Mme. Amalie Joachim will produce at a concert in October a new and unpublished work by Brahms. It is entitled "Zigeunerlieder" (gipsy songs), and is written for four voices, with pianoforte accompaniment.

WAGNER'S AIMS AND SACRED MUSIC.

The New York weekly journal, The Churchman, for September 1st, contains an article in which Wagner's views are so intelligently represented, and which is so obviously not an example of "special pleading" for or against the Bayreuth master, that we reprint it entire. We have no desire to break the Tenth Commandment, but at the same time it would have been a satisfaction to feel that views so temperately stated had first been printed on this side of the dividing waves.

"In his correspondence with Liszt, Wagner presents, with characteristic directness, his convictions concerning the due development of operatic art, and its growth as an educational force among the people. We quote his admirable sayings as a text for comment on quite another plane of musical suggestion. He writes: 'It is a great mistake to think that a theatrical audience must have a special knowledge of music in order to receive the right impression of a musical drama. To this entirely erroneous opinion we have been brought by the fact that in opera, music has wrongly been made the aim, while the drama was merely a means for the display of the music. Music, on the contrary, should do no more than contribute its full share towards making the drama clearly and quickly comprehensible at every moment. While listening to a good, that is, rational opera, people should, so to speak, not think of the music at all, but only feel it in an unconscious manner, while their fullest sympathy should be wholly occupied by the action represented.'

"As usual, when the master speaks, he touches the root of the matter. His poem-drama of the Tannhauser, and of the Lohengrin, for example, are, in his view, paramount to the musical symphonic descant with which he has adorned them. It is the story, rather than the music; and the listener who is wholly taken up with the musical setting gathers the rind at loss of the fruit. In other words, music is distinctly subordinated to the text. No musical interpretation of Il Penseroso, or Lycidas, should interrupt or submerge the solemn measures of these matchless verses.

"We will shift the illustration, without violence or incongruity, to the higher plane of distinctly religious music. Bach and Handel, without theorizing in the premises, laid tremendous emphasis on the text, and no intelligent director would for an instant violate the relation. In the most highly elaborated contrapuntal phrases and movements of the 'Passion music' the sacred text shines out luminous over all, and a crowning glory of the 'Messiah' oratorio is the traditional English delivery of the sacred text, with all the impressiveness of a spirited and scholarly declamation. Indeed, the reading of the 'Messiah' has always been held in chiefest account, notwithstanding the eloquence and impressiveness of its wonderful accompaniment.

"The same is true of the 'Elijah.' It is true of all of Mendelssohn's religious compositions—that it is the story, the drama, the narration which dominates the music.

"In other directions, however, we find this organic and necessary relation between text and music wantonly violated. Take, in thought, the Mozart masses, and many of the Haydn masses. Nothing can be plainer than the intentional domination of the music-structure over the sacred anthems of the mass. The music form was the initial and imperative consideration, and the text is strained, inverted, violated, chopped up in syllabic morsels, until all coherence and spiritual power disappears in this process of disintegration. Indeed, it may with all weight of religious and æsthetic conclusion be well questioned whether that is religious music which virtually obliterates the sacred text, the illustration of which is its only function.

"The musician may derive all manner of incidental delight from the structural art of Mozart and Haydn and their followers in the treatment of the Mass, but the devout and would-be-worshipper, who seeks communion with the Lord, is robbed of the 'comfortable words' on which the soul leans for refreshment, and the highest act and supremest hour of Christian worship is degraded to a distracting musical episode. Try to pursue the text of the Creed, the great symbol that should stand out at the heart of the service, evidently, as the sun itself; transfer it, if you please, to some of our modern highly ornate Anglican services, and see how much of the English version the composers leave within reach of the people. Here and there a familiar word strikes the ear, or a detached phrase; but, on the whole, it is a blurred medley of dislocated words and syllables afloat in a storm of oppressive harmonies; well nigh like a sheaf of sound wheat in the jaws of a thresher.

"And now we have reached the objective part of our transcendent Wagner philosophy, and that is, that in the Church services, the text of anthems, offertories, and hymns is supreme, while their musical interpretation is absolutely subordinate. The music which hides, obscures, or blurrs the text is an impertinence and an impiety. There is already quite too large an infiltration of the Mozart theory of construction among our composers, which uses the text arbitrarily as a mere convenience for musical development. Some of our grandest anthem compositions by English living masters are open to these strictures. The text is habitually contorted and violated to suit the requirements of structural art, and but little of the spiritual edification dormant in the services comes to the surface. To this humiliation of the text is chargeable the confessed tediousness of many otherwise meritorious services, as the muttered and muffled Te Deum, especially where the fugue now and then gets the upper hand and tosses about word and syllable with wanton dexterity; Creed, swathed, transposed, and broken into crumbs, all congruity and solemnity of statement, gone by the board; the long, intricate anthem, in which between composer, accompanist and a half articulate reading, the splendid text is sorely despoiled and its graces and refreshment utterly wasted; are not these, one and all, a sore weariness and burden, especially to the unmusical and simple-minded? And yet magnify the Wagnerian maxim, elevate the text, the story, the divine drama, compel attention thereto by helpful, well-subordinated musical art, devout, well-tempered, and there shall be little of dull, spiritless, half-hearted, public worship."

BRISTOL MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From a Bristol Correspondent).

As your readers are already aware, the sixth Triennial Musical Festival will be held at the Colston Hall, Bristol, on October 16, 17, 18, and 19. In the keen competition between the Festival Societies which of late years have sprung up in our great towns to compete with Birmingham and the three choir gatherings in Gloucester, Hereford, and Worcester, lover of the high-class music is highly favoured. And nowhere is this better exemplified than in Bristol, where the programme for the approaching triennial gathering is not only rich and varied beyond any that have preceded it, but the artists engaged are all of the highest rank. Sir Charles Hallé's famous band has been increased in number, and the Festival Choir, of nearly 400 voices, have never before been more kept up to the highest standard of training. Those who favour the support of English musicians at these great feasts of music will be delighted to find included in the programme Sir Arthur Sullivan's famous cantata, "The Golden Legend," and Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's dramatic oratorio, "The Rose of Sharon." It is true that the programme does not include any absolutely new work, but "The Rose of Sharon," Berlioz's dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," Cherubini's "Fourth Mass" in C, and the interesting portion of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Tauris," with several orchestral works, will be produced for the first time in Bristol, and will come to many with all the freshness of novelty. Coming to the principal vocalists—Madame Albani, who has sung at every Festival here since the initial one of 1873, will sing in five of the concerts—in "Elijah," Cherubini's "Fourth Mass," Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon" (a favourite work of hers), the "Golden Legend," and she will take part in two of the evening concerts. Miss Anna Williams, who is now an established favourite, will also be welcomed. At the last Triennial Festival she sang the soprano solos in "Elijah;" she will now share them with Madame Albani. Next comes the equally acceptable Mademe Patey, who has been engaged especially for "Elijah" and the "Messiah." Madame Trebelli, who, like Madame Albani, has been absent from only one Bristol Festival, will sing in Dr. Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon" for the first time. She also sings in the "Fourth Mass," and takes the part of Juliet in "Romeo and Juliet." In Madame Belle Cole we shall have the first opportunity of hearing an American contralto who has gained a very high reputation at concerts at the Albert Hall and elsewhere. Of Mr. Edward Lloyd and of Mr. Charles Santley it is unnecessary to say more than that in their absence a Festival programme would be incomplete. Mr. Charles Banks comes with an excellent reputation, and has been strongly recommended by Sir Charles Hallé; Mr. Watkin Mills, the rapidly rising bass, and Mr. Montague Worlock, the local baritone, complete the list of vocal principals, and it should be added that Mr. George Riseley will be at the organ. Thus in both high class works and artists of the very first rank the Bristol Festival maintains the high standard of excellence it has held from its inauguration 15 years ago.

CALLIRHOË.

A Dramatic Cantata,

MUSIC BY

J. FREDERICK BRIDGE, Mus. Doc.

Composed expressly for the

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL, 1888.

PRICE IN PAPER COVER, 2s. 6d.
VOCAL PARTS EACH 1s.

London: Novello, Ewer, & Co.,

Press Opinions:—

The success of Dr. Bridge's cantata is beyond dispute, and we shall probably hear much of it during the approaching reason.—Daily Telegraph.

Callirhoe brings to light a native composer who has fancy and originality, in addition to thorough knowledge of the technical means by which these inestimable gifts are calculated to yield artistic benefit.—Chronicle.

Dr. Bridge's new composition will take high rank among his works, for he has written it with much knowledge of vocal and instrumental effect, and no small graphic delineation.—Guardian.

Melodic charm and modern harmonic effect—the solos for the soprano are exceptionally pleasing.—Musical World

Dr. Bridge is anything but a Wagnerite, but he has escaped the shadow of the cloisters in all this exciting music, which is perfectly modern in its free development and display of passion.—Standard.

The work is one in which the Westminister Abbey organist should be proud.—Figaro.

There can be little doubt that his new cantata will ere long become popular in all parts of the country.—Globe.

It ought to take every high rank among the popular cantata of the modern repertory. In the provinces and among ordinary choral societies there is little doubt that Callirhoe will be in immediate demand, not only because the choral work is so sympathetic and effective, but also because it really needs the engagement of only two artists out of the usual quartet, the contralto having very little, the baritone nothing to do.—Daily News.

Will doubtless find a speedy welcome among choral societies.—Morning Post.

May be strongly recommended to the notice of choral societies as certain to interest them and their audiences.—Athenæum.

STORY OF THE OLD ORGAN IN THE CATHEDRAL "BEATÆ MARIÆ VIRGINIS," IN WOLFENBUTTEL.

Written from information in existing documents by Selmar Muller, and translated by F. E. T.

VII.

It is to the court organ builder, Husemann, who repaired the organ about the year 1766, that we are indebted for several fine stops. I may mention particularly the fine Quintatön (16 feet), Gedackt (8 feet), Rohrflöte (8 feet), and Spitzflöte (4 feet), in the Upper Manual; and in the Great, the beautiful, if somewhat too delicate, Gamba (8 feet), which has rather the tone quality of a Salicional. The Pedal Organ included a six-rank mixture, which was unfortunately removed later. It was at this time that the case was brought more forward. We now come to the last great repairing of the old work. In January, 1827, the organist, Christian Heinrich Strube, drew up a report of the condition in which he found the organ upon entering his appointment. He found many faults in the instrument, and advised a rebuild, mentioning four organ builders: Hess of Erfurt, Schmerbach of Cassel, Apel in Aschersleben, and Warnicke of Helmstedt, recommending the second of these.

However, some years elapsed before the necessary repairs were done, for it was not till 1833 that Warnicke sent in a specification in which he agreed to do all the alterations for the sum of 1,000 Thalers. This was accepted by the authorities; but in the meantime, Warnicke died, and the work fell into the hands of Kreutz of Brunswick, who undertook it for 893 Thalers, and a further payment of 200 Thalers. The organist Strube, in a confidential letter to the Church authorities, expressed his doubts as to Kreutz's ability to undertake the work.

However, Strube's scruples do not appear to have had much effect, for a contract was drawn up with Kreutz in January, 1835.

In addition to cleaning and repairing the organ, certain stops were to be enlarged. Thus, the Open Sub-bass (16 feet) was proposed to be changed into a 32 feet, but this, with other alterations, was not carried out. Early in December, 1835, Kreutz finished his work, which was duly tested and approved by the organist Kelbe, of Brunswick, and Strube. Both reports declared his work to be quite satisfactory.

PIANOFORTE VERSUS ORGAN TOUCH.

At the Providence, U.S., meeting of the American Music Teachers' Association, an interesting paper was read by Dr. S. N. Penfield on "How far is the study of the Piano advantageous as a preparation to that of the Organ." Dr. Penfield spoke much as follows:—

"The question under consideration is a broad one and a suggestive one, more so than would appear on its face, and cannot be answered without glancing for a minute at some collateral subjects, by way of preliminary.

"Let us first inquire what is the organ, what its true literature, and what the work of the artistic organist? The modern organ is to some extent a reproducer of all musical effects. While it can never be properly called an imitation, it may be a substitute for an orchestra, for a solo instrument, for a piano, for a military band, for a solo singer, for a grand chorus. A composer has certain ideas running in his head, at first, mayhap, like grains of mustard seed. These, under his closely attentive eye and thought, spread out with roots and branches and develop into the great tree of an entire musical composition. The writer says to himself, this passage fits to the violin, that to the clarionet, another can be rendered only by the 'cello. He hits on some effects which make capital piano pieces, while others are better suited to the voice. The modern organ can represent reasonably well most all these effects—has, moreover, certain shades and nuances of tone peculiar to itself and quite wanting elsewhere. So the organist says to himself, this passage fits to the melodia stop, that to the oboe, this to one certain combination and that to another. In fact, the organist who would succeed in all varieties of organ playing must be not only versatile by nature, but practically acquainted with music of all classes and, if possible, with orchestral instruments themselves; and if he sings, it is better yet. He will then accompany singers more intelligently and drill his choir to better purpose. He must clearly and quickly discern the various tone requirements of the music, instantly draw the proper stop combination, and, as the saying is, 'never lose his head.'

"The reciprocal effect of studying together different branches of music is too little understood. I remember when a boy and studying the piano, and having a passion to undertake the violin, the flute, and the cornet, objection was made (but happily overruled) that they would interfere with the piano, and in a narrow, contracted sense the objection might hold good. They might take time that otherwise would be devoted to the piano. Yet, granted a special study of the instrument or of the voice, there is also a time limit to profitable practice of this, while another department of music will still have the charm of novel interest, and its study may be added to the original time limit. Furthermore, the study of music in any two or more branches stimulates attention as to their relative scales and other technical formations, to their relative musical effects and means of producing the same, so that one is lead to compare and reflect, and thus to study each more intelligently and to better purpose. Let us read the lives of great musicians, and we will find that, while making their specialty, they have also a practical knowledge of other departments of music. We find as analogous cases the physicians and lawyers of great and skilful repute, who have, in probably all cases, not only studied their own profession, but are reasonably expert in other arts and professions which are in some ways related. Were it possible to follow the career of all the really great organists, we should doubtless learn that they were at least fair pianists. We need only refer at present to the examples of Bach and Handel, wonderful organists, whose performances were unquestionably aided materially by their intimate knowledge of the piano—and of Mendelssohn, Mozart and Saint-Saëns, admirable pianists and withal fine organists.

"Let us now compare more specifically the piano and the organ. Having the same manual key-board, except in number of octaves, it is frequently possible to play the same music on both instruments. Yet not with equal success, piano music requiring mostly a loose, elastic finger touch, varying continually in strength to bring out the necessary light and shade, with a pressure upon the keys to properly enunciate a melodic phrase, with a genuine wrist movement in staccato chords and octaves, and the nearest approach to the organ touch only in strong legato passages. The organ requires, almost invariably, a quick and decided touch, with firm pressure, very legato and very prompt. As organ music consists largely of compositions containing two or three voices in one hand, perhaps in each hand, and each voice must be absolutely legato, a great deal of shifting fingers upon the keys is required. Also the organ has no staccato music, looking from the pianist's standpoint, the staccato effects in organ music corresponding somewhat to the half staccato on the piano, the firm pressure being still required before the hands spring from the keys. There are also numerous other points of difference in the touch of the two. Now, the player who really succeeds on both instruments is the one who studies both faithfully and carefully and keeps the two styles of touch separate and distinct. This is not a difficult task, if one only has a love for both instruments and a deal of patience. Not only this, the organist who comes from piano study has generally a more prompt and decided attack of the notes than others, while the pianist learns from the organ a more genuine legato touch. Thus each instrument may be, and frequently is, a positive assistance to the study of the other. All organists are originally students of the piano or the cabinet organ, and my experience teaches me that piano students sooner acquire the organ touch if they are thoroughly in earnest, while the cabinet organists have generally a weak, uncertain delivery, which is difficult to break. Right here the fact may occur to some that nearly all piano teachers aspire to be organists, and after a short trial a great number of them fail utterly and are superseded perhaps by amateurs who cannot play well a single piano piece. Why is this? Malicious persons might hint that these unfortunates aspired only to draw their salaries with the least compatible exertion. The more probable explanation is that they did not discern the different styles of music and touch suited to the two instruments, and thus failed by attempting to make a piano out of the organ, or because they did not study the proper combinations of stops, or from impatience with that bugbear of pianists, pedal playing. How frequently is it true that, after people have succeeded reasonably well on the piano or some other instrument, they have little patience to undertake the fundamental and systematic study of the organ. Such persons should leave the organ alone and stick to the piano or other instrument for which they were adapted, even if the instrument were a woodsaw. But organists claim frequently that their organs are so ineffective, or the musical demands of the congregations at so low an ebb, that their own aspirations after something better are strangled in their birth. These pleas are each year lessening in avail, as the new organs constantly being built with modern improvements, and the advancing musical taste, call ever for an advance in the skill of the organist. Were it, however, otherwise, it should be borne in mind that the taste of the people, and especially of the rising generation, will always be formed on models that are actually presented. No one ever acquires a correct taste in painting by studying daubs; in sculpture, by gazing at cigar-store images; in church music, by hearing Sankey effusions; or in organ voluntaries, by listening to the meaningless improvisations of the self-satisfied church organist. Yet the most conscientious organist not infrequently fails, by aiming his music too far above the heads of his audience, or it may be from lack of sympathy with the devotional part of the service, which latter, strangely enough, is often quite overlooked. The true organist is never content with mechanically grinding through the service and drowning out the tramping feet of entering and departing audiences, but treats all of the music as an integral part of the religious or other service in which he may be engaged; is fully abreast of the musical requirements of the age, yet while himself an earnest seeker after a high ideal, uses plain common sense, and coaxes rather than drives to a higher level the musical taste of his audience.

"Let us now consider for a moment the practice of organ music on the pedal piano. This I unhesitatingly recommend to all who have first acquired the organ touch, for the preliminary work on organ pieces. Practice on the organ itself is always attended with difficulties, which in many cases prove fatal to true progress. Difficulty in getting and keeping blowers, freezing of fingers in a cold church, the tardy sound to the ears of the player which is noticeable in all large organs, making the time unsteady, and the stimulating effect of the organ which induces to performing rather than practising. The pedal piano in one's own room is ever ready and prompt in response. Yet the organist working thereon must temporarily forget that it is a piano, and carefully employ the firm organ touch and retaining of keys. When the piece is technically learned, it should be transferred to the organ and studied for registration and proper organ effects. The pedal cabinet organ may answer instead of the piano if a blower is at hand, yet here the firm organ touch must be retained.

"It still remains for us to compare piano and organ compositions. Organ music is generally classed under two heads, the strict and the free school. The former, strictly contrapuntal in its treatment, with development of one or more themes according to certain fixed rules, was essentially founded by John Sebastian Bach, whose numerous contributions to it are still the acknowledged masterpieces of organ literature. By the term 'free' school is generally understood everything that is not 'strict,' whether original organ compositions or transcriptions of vocal or instrumental works. Music of the former class has the elements of enduring and increasing interest. That of the latter is ephemeral and must be continually replaced by novelties.

"It has long been the habit of certain classical organists to play only strict music, and on all occasions, and to decry the free as necessarily a prostitution of the noble instrument. On the other hand, the free organists, following their own inclinations, or the supposed demands of the unthinking public, frequently drift into a superficial, sentimental, even a frivolous style of music. This is not the time or place to explain or defend either the one or the other school. Both are measurably right, and each in the extreme is wrong. Yet the best music for the organ, of whatever school, is highly melodic, and even contrapuntal (which latter term, contrary to the commonly received impression, practically signifies the extreme of melodic effect). Suffice it farther that our modern organs, with their numerous mechanical appliances and registers of novel and characteristic tone, make possible, under the hands and feet of a skilful performer, a highly effective, interesting, and ever widening field of music, which is stimulating the best efforts of modern writers and creating a genuine popular interest in and love for this much-enduring, much-abused instrument.

"Now, looking at the other side, there is piano music and piano music—music strict, music free, music lively, music severe, music delightful, music excruciating, music which grows on us the more it is heard, and music which, sounding sweet and pretty at first, is voted a bore ever after. Whatever be the merits of this vast variety of piano music, a large proportion is worse than useless as a preparation for the organ. Dashing, pyrotechnic music, intended only for the display of digital dexterity, and thin, superficial music, is certainly no assistant to organ study. In brief, we may say that the piano music prepares best for the organ which is dignified, which cultivates and stimulates the sense of melody, which is melodic not only in the upper voice, but in the middle voices and in the bass—music, withal, which seems to talk directly to us from all its parts—music that means something. In saying this it must not be overlooked that much of the very best organ and piano music must be studied and heard many times before appreciation comes, must be undertaken by the young student on trust in the teacher's advice, like the first dish of oysters or the first shower bath on the advice of the parent; at first disagreeable, it may be, it becomes afterwards a positive luxury. The organ student is always safe in studying Bach's inventions and well-tempered clavichord, Beethoven's sonatas and concertos, all of Mendelssohn's works, especially the Songs without Words, and most of the works of Chopin, Rubinstein, Jensen, Henselt, Heller, and other thoughtful writers; and he is pretty certain to go from them to the King of instruments with a renewed incentive to the pursuit thereon of the true, the beautiful and the good."

MR. GRIFFITH ON CHURCH MUSIC.

Under the head of "Reform in Church Music," Mr. E. Griffith, F.C.O., is contributing a series of articles to Church Bells. Without desiring to pilfer from an excellent contemporary, a few quotations are presented from the first article, which will give an idea of the writer's views; and it should be added, Mr. Griffith is well known as an earnest and experienced Church musician, whose opinio are entitled to respect.

"From an experience of many years as an organist, choi master, and Church musician, and from meditation an reflection upon the design and spirit of our Prayer-boo together with the wants and capabilities of our congregation I am deeply convinced that the elaborate and ornate charact of the music now in general use is destroying the very spir of our Liturgy, and giving just cause for describing ou services as 'sensational performances.' That a real dange to the Church exists in such injudicious efforts to depriv congregations of their share in public worship is beyond doub and in this opinion I am confirmed by numerous clerg (upwards of a hundred) who have kindly answered my inquiri on the subject.

"The Reformed Prayer-book is the undoubted property the people, for it restores to the lay-folk their primitive sha in Divine offices, and therefore ought jealously to be guarde Ignorance of music on the part of the clergy is not an adequa excuse for allowing a choir to monopolise the privilege praising God; nor does it require a musical ear to know whe a congregation is silent.

"A learned Canon of one of our cathedrals and Vicar of large town parish says, that 'if this subject is to lay serio hold of the public mind, it will have to be persistently pound into it by and through the press. Whatever the merits of question per se, it is now become well-nigh impossible interest the public in it except through persevering discussio in the newspapers; which, of course, involves labour an controversy.' There is much truth in this as regards questio interesting to people who can, by voting and other mean settle them; but in matters affecting the proper interpretatio of the Prayer-book and its offices, people are generally conte (often carelessly so) to leave all this to the clergy, whom the trust as the guardians of their privileges.

"I propose taking the order of the services as they occ in the Prayer-book; and although the organ voluntary is part of the authorised Liturgy, yet its importance deman some notice. As its name imports, it should be th outpouring of the organist's heart—an appropriate impro isation to prepare all worshippers for the solemn duti before them. This was the more general style adopted the old organists, who, as a rule, were well versed in th science of harmony and thorough bass.

"A large proportion of modern organists confine the voluntaries to arrangements from oratorios, masses, et most of which are inappropriate for opening a servic There certainly are good compositions by several of o Church composers, and many by German writers for th organ, which are admirably adapted for producing a devotion frame of mind. For, be it remembered, it is the religio value, even more than the musical which attaches to th voluntary; and a musical sermon can be preached by th judicious and thoughtful organist during those few minut preluding the service. Every organist, whatever h reputation, should study most intently for this solemn use his office, 'which would become all but priestly in its hi religious intent.' 'Why,' asks a recent writer (M Proudman), 'do not our organists more justly apprecia the value of that quiet few minutes' preliminary to th service? If I might make a suggestion to the Coun of the College of Organists, it is that every candidate for th diploma of Fellowship should show powers of pure volunta playing—chiefly using the diapason work—and extemporisi as for an opening service. That there is much need reform in this direction is apparent to the minds of devotion Churchmen, and it is one more responsibility resting up the clergy when selecting an organist.

"There is a great want of some selection of voluntaries arranged for the Church's seasons, which young and inexperienced organists might advantageously follow, and clergy could point to for use. College of Organists, please note."

An attempt to improve Church music on purely congregational grounds seems illogical, because inartistic, and because such an effort necessarily sides to some extent with musical ignorance and prejudice. This is the crux of Mr. Griffith's position. Again he does not seem to take into account the reason before given that congregational singing has suffered in consequence of the spread of musical education; a growth as yet only partial, but strong enough to arouse people to a recognition of the fact that the art of music is a delicate plant demanding careful cultivation. So the silence of the people's song does not arise so much from a deprivation resulting from the more assertive attitude of trained singers and organists, as it does from a growing popular perception, the result of increased musical knowledge, that there is a time to be silent as well as a time to sing, and that in music as in other arts "Fools (may) rush in where Angels fear to tread." Mr. Griffith will do useful work if he points out the possibility of training those who are able and willing to sing, and shows at the same time something of the limits within which congregational singing should be kept, as in its proper place in the service scheme; and one may add he should offer some instruction to congregations, whereby they may be taught to listen to music as to a ministry of its kind, as well as a general medium of prayer and praise; a distinction perfectly well understood with regard to the use of the verbal language in Church. Of course, Mr. Griffith will have the sympathy of many well-meaning but short-sighted clergymen; they are naturally not greatly interested in the development of any form of sacred art, save the art of oratory; and the repression of artistic instincts in Church music, and the limitation of that noble art to a dwarfed, unwholesome, and restricted condition is a proposal which will meet with a large share of some behind-the-wants-of-the-age clerical sympathies.

With regard to the duties of an organist in the performance of appropriate voluntaries, Mr. Griffith will be more easily followed. He should be reminded, however, that of late years the very complete scheme of F.C.O. Church-playing tests, extemporisation is included of sufficient length to display the candidates' aptitude; and thus the College of Organists is doing good work in, among other directions, the propagation of the useful art of extempore organ-playing. Perhaps further remarks may be called for in the course of the issue of Mr. Griffith's opinions upon a very important subject.

RECITAL NEWS.

St. John's, Waterloo Road.—Programme of Recital given on September 2nd, 1888, by Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, A.C.O.: Jubilant March, Stainer; Pastorale, Kullak; Offertoire in G (written for Birmingham Festival, 1888), J. F. Barnett; Sonata in D minor, Topfer. Free popular Organ Recitals on each Tuesday in September, at 8.15 p.m., by Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, A.C.O. Programme for September 4th: Offertoire in G, Wely; Wedding March, Wagner; Air varied, Wesley; Hallelujah Chorus, Handel; Meditation in a ruined Abbey, Barnett; Grand Choeur, Guilmant. The organ will shortly receive the addition of a fourth manual (to contain five stops) at the hands of Messrs. Hele and Co., Plymouth and London.

Two Organ Recitals were given on Tuesday last by Mr. George Shinn, Mus. Bac. Cantab, at the Irish Exhibition, when compositions by the following were performed:—Bach, Batiste, Donizetti, Gounod, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Macbeth, Rossini, Shinn.

Folkestone.—At Christ Church, on August 30th, an Organ Recital was given by Mr. F. E. Fletcher, Mus. Bac. (Trin. Coll., Tor.), F.C.O., and vocal selections by the Christ Church Choir. Programme: Sonata in B flat (No. 4), Mendelssohn; Anthem, "Thou wilt keep him," the Choir, Trimnell; Prelude and Fugue in A, Bach; Andante Pastorale (Light of the World), Sullivan; Terzetto, "Lift thine eyes" (Elijah), Mendelssohn; Invocation in F, Salomé; Offertoire in G, Batiste; Anthem, "O come let us worship" (95th Psalm), the Choir, Mendelssohn; Cantilene Pastorale, Guilmant; Marche Religieuse in F, Guilmant.

Church of St. Nicholas Cole-Abbey.—On September 4th Mr. H. W. Weston, F.C.O. (Organist, Wandsworth Parish Church, S.W.), gave a Recital. Programme: Allegro in B flat (from Organ Concerto, Set 3, No. 3), Handel; Andante and Variations in A major, Dr. W. Rea; Offertoire in G major (specially composed for the Birmingham Festival), J. F. Barnett; Adagio and Rondo in F major (arranged for the organ from the orchestral score by H. W. Weston), C. M. Weber; Grand Offertoire upon the Gregorian melody to "O Filii et Filiæ," Alex. Guilmant; Organ Overture in E minor, Morandi.

Notes.

It is gratifying to note that the new Birmingham Town Hall Organist, Mr. C. Perkins, a former pupil of Dr. Bridge, of Westminster, did good service at the recent Festival. "Mr. Perkins," says a contemporary, "played the solo portions of the Overture to Handel's 'Saul' with the most charming neatness." Other testimony goes to show that Mr. Perkins got through his first Festival duties with great credit.

Mr. J. S. Bumpus, in his valuable papers on "The Organists and Composers of St. Paul's Cathedral, observes:—"A very curious old organ-book in the possession of the writer contains Batten's first verse Service mentioned above, and a large number of his anthems, including two or three not given by Barnard. The same book comprises a very florid and curious accompaniment to Gibbons' Service in F, which, by the way, is transposed from F into G." Dr. E. J. Hopkins also, the present writer believes, possesses a copy of Gibbons in F transposed into G.

A large organ was opened the other week at Kirkby Stephen Parish Church with a special festival service. The organ was built by Mr. J. Abbot, Leeds, and its fine oak screen was designed by Mr. Norman Shaw, R.A.

The Dean of Denver Cathedral, Colorado, writes to the American Art Journal regarding the musical doings of his church. The choir, it seems, often numbers fifty voices, and large musical services are frequently held. Dr. Gower is announced as Precentor and Organist, and Mr. H. Houseley, F.C.O., as Sub-Organist and Choirmaster. Mr. Walter Hall, F.C.O., has an important appointment in the same city; so three well-trained English organists, members of the College of Organists, are at work there, and music is said to be rapidly advancing in the locality.

DR. LANGDON COLBORNE.

Dr. Langdon Colborne, who was born in London in 1837, studied first at the Royal Academy of Music, and afterwards under the late Mr. George Cooper, organist of St. Sepulchre's and the Chapel Royal. On the appointment of Dr. Stainer to Magdalen College, Oxford, Dr. Colborne succeeded him as organist of St. Michael's College, Tenbury, and remained there seventeen years, actively promoting the good work for which the College was founded by the Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ousely:—the encouragement and improvement of choral services and the education of boys in music and general knowledge On leaving Tenbury, Dr. Colborne went for a short time to Beverley Minster, from thence to Wigan Parish Church, and on the death of Dr. Townshend Smith, in 1877, was appointed organist at Hereford and ex-officio Conductor of the Festival. His compositions, consisting mostly of services and anthems, with a few part-songs and solos, are much appreciated. The sacred cantata, "Samuel," heard last Sunday in Hereford Cathedral for the first time, is, we believe, Dr. Colborne's most important work.

Hereford Musical Festival.

That the Festival of the Three Choirs is the most important musical event in the West of England, may be accepted without discussion, although those who direct the arrangement of the various programmes have not, in the past, been accustomed to distinguish themselves by the production of novelties of any great and lasting value. But it should be remembered that new compositions of excellence are not too common anywhere, and perhaps the means at the disposal of the Western Festival Committees are not such as to enable them to provide much startlingly original matter. But the earnestness and devotion with which masterpieces, more or less familiar, are produced on these occasions, entitle the Festival to respect.

The Festival of the present year commenced on Tuesday last, but it had been, to some extent, ushered in by a special service in the Cathedral on Sunday, when the only work expressly composed for the Festival, was offered. This was a cantata composed by Dr. Langdon Colborne, the organist of the Cathedral, and having for its subject the story of Samuel. The book of the new work is compiled by the Rev. J. R. G. Taylor from the Scriptural text and "Hymns Ancient and Modern." Dr. Colborne has adopted the idea of enlisting the services of the congregation by interpolating a series of familiar hymns and words into the work, which the congregation are invited to sing. The idea is carried out with considerable skill, and, so far from coming as unwelcome interruptions, the hymns serve to emphasise and distinguish the various sentiments expressed in the body of the narrative, besides awakening a greater interest on the part of the listeners. It is easy to see that in the music Dr. Colborne has striven earnestly after simplicity, and has endeavoured to write a work which should lie within the executive capacities of the average amateur. With such an end in view, it was almost inevitable that something of force and originality should be sacrificed. To be original and simple at the same time is the privilege only of consummate genius; and it would be obviously unfair to quarrel with Dr. Colborne because he is not a Beethoven. The music of "Samuel" is always thoughtful and graceful, and often a great deal more than either of these. It was given on Sunday by the Cathedral choir, augmented by strong contingents from outside, the band being under the leadership of M. Zerbini, and produced a highly satisfactory impression.

A service which may be regarded as the second inaugural function of the week was held on Tuesday morning, the musical portions of which were given by the Three Choirs, the sermon being preached by the Rev. Sir F. Gore Ouseley, Bart, whose composition "St. Polycarp" is not the least attractive item in the programme. Contrary to general expectation, the accomplished preacher said little or nothing concerning music, per se, but dwelt rather upon the benevolent objects of the promoters of the Festival, present and past, tracing the unbroken record from the year 1724. The service chosen for the occasion was "Hopkins in C" and Dr. Wesley's fine anthem, "Ascribe under the Lord" which admirable representatives of English Church music were given with much impressiveness.

On Tuesday afternoon the "Elijah" was given to an audience which, though appreciative, was by no means so large as might have been expected by those who regard Mendelssohn's work as one of the most powerful attractions of a Festival Programme. The solos were in the hands of Miss Anna Williams, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, these artists being joined in the concerted numbers by Miss Ambler, Mrs. Andrews, Mr. Castings, Mr. Banks, Mr. Ineson, and Mr. Brereton. That the principal soloists acquitted themselves excellently of tasks in the performance of which they long since won their laurels goes without saying, although it may be mentioned that Mr. Lloyd gave a rendering of "If with all your hearts" which, for emotional power, he himself has never surpassed. A word of special commendation also, should be given to Madame Enriquez, whose interpretation of "Woe unto them" was singularly truthful. impossible to say, however, that the performance as a whole was entirely adequate, though in the main the choruses were given with much solidity and precision. One or two unaccountable mistakes must, in justice to the excellent choir and band, be attributed to the conductor.

On the evening of the same day the "Golden Legend" was given, Sir Arthur Sullivan conducting in person. The crowded attendance proved how just are the anticipations of those who believe that no Festival can be thoroughly popular which does not include Sir Arthur's melodious and graceful work. On the occasion in question every seat was occupied, and the work was received, in all its details, with the utmost enthusiasm. The solos were taken by Madame Albani, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Stanley Smith, and Mr. Brereton. Of these, the great soprano and Mr. Lloyd are so entirely identified with their parts that it is unnecessary to do more than chronicle a repetition of their former triumphs. Miss Hilda Wilson's sympathetic voice was heard to excellent purpose in the contralto music, and notably in the prayer to the Virgin. Mr. Brereton, if we mistake not, assumed the part of Lucifer for the first time, and made a distinct success therein. This earnest and conscientious young artist imparted an amount of individuality and force to the music, by legitimate and thoroughly artistic methods of expression, which did him infinite credit. In the small, but not important, part of the Forester Mr. Stanley Smith did good service. The chorus was entirely satisfactory, giving the Evening Hymn and the charming number, "O pure in heart" with exquisite grace and expression, while the final fugue was delivered with much fire and accuracy. With the band no worse fault can be found than that it occasionally mistook zeal for refinement.

Wednesday morning was devoted to Handel's "Samson," and Sterndale Bennett's "The Woman of Samaria": Wednesday evening to the "Creation," Spohr's "God, Thou Art Great," and Schubert's "Song of Miriam"; we are compelled, however, to hold over notices of these and the remaining Concerts, until our next issue.

IN THE MIDLANDS

BIRMINGHAM, SEPTEMBER 12.

The Musical Festival excitement has passed away, and Birmingham has once more resumed its ordinary aspect. We are now entering upon our musical season, and next week will be issued, in glowing colours, a menu of all the concerts, great and small, at which music lovers will be invited to attend. Messrs. Harrison as usual stand out boldly, indeed foremost, among Birmingham entrepreneurs. They have engaged for their four Concerts every available artiste of repute; and for the first time in Birmingham, the celebrated Heckmann String Quartet, and the wonderful little pianist, Otto Hegner, will appear at one of the Concerts. Among the many vocalists may be mentioned Mesdames Albani, Valleria, Nordica, Madame and Mdlle. Trebelli, Miss Alice Whitacre, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Banks, Foli, Barrington Foote, and a host of others. Sir Charles Hallé and his celebrated band, with Madame (Lady) Norman Neruda, are put down for the last Concert. The Birmingham Festival Choral Society have decided to give four Concerts, notwithstanding the fact that the accounts of the last two seasons showed a heavy deficit. Dr. Hubert Parry's Oratorio, "Judith," so well received at the Festival, "The Redemption," and "Elijah," will be given in succession. Then we have Mr. Stockley's four Grand Orchestral Concerts, which promise this year to be of an exceptionally high order. His band now consists of eighty performers, comprising the finest instrumentalists in the Midlands, assisted by several well-known London leaders. The cheap and popular Concerts, generally held on Saturday evenings, begin on the 22nd September, when the Midland Musical Association will give Gaul's "Holy City," and Anderton's "John Gilpin," with full band and chorus. Mr. Gilmer and his celebrated Military Band will also resume their Saturday Military Band Concerts, which proved such a success last season. In addition to this goodly spread, we shall have the usual amount of private and benefit Concerts, so that altogether the season promises to be an uninterrupted musical feast. I may here mention that Mr. W. H. Cummings has kindly consented to give a Lecture before the members of the Birmingham and Midland Musical Guild, on October 30th, taking for his subject, "Nineteenth Century Music," with illustrations. He will be assisted by his son, who has only lately returned from the Leipzig Conservatorium.

The only notable musical event this week has been the return visit of the Russian Opera Company, who have given Rubinstein's "Demon," and Verdi's "Rigoletto," in the Russian language. The remarkable performance of the "Demon," which on their former visit took Birmingham by storm, again proved the principal attraction. We have already spoken in these columns of Mr. Tartakow's wonderful impersonation of the amorous fiend; since then the part has been sustained by Mr. Michael Winogradow, with equal force and dramatic art. Tschaikowski's "Mazeppa," based on a poem by Puschkine, was given on Monday evening for the first time. The subject is terribly lugubrious, dealing with a prison and torture chamber, a scaffold and double execution. The scene is in Russia Minor, at the beginning of the eighteenth century, when Czar Peter the Great reigned, and Russia was invaded by Charles XII of Sweden. The battle of Pultowa forms the subject of a grand symphonic tone-picture, by Peter Tschaikowski.

A BOOK AND A MAGAZINE.

The latest accession to the charming little series of Canterbury Poets, published by Mr. Walter Scott, is a selection from the poems of Robert Southey, edited, with biographical and critical introduction, by Sidney R. Thompson. The opening sentences of this are so excellent, and deal with a question fraught with so much interest to artists generally, that we quote them entire:—"To say that although the principles of art are in their essentials eternal and changeless, the fashionable canons of artistic criticism are temporal and changing is a platitude almost unpardonable; but it is one which is inevitably suggested to the critic who should endeavour, in the latter half of the Nineteenth Century, to write in praise of Robert Southey. The list of England's laureates names no poet more widely separated from the world of to-day than this man. Neglect has been his portion for many years—neglect undeserved, but scarcely unnatural, for the pervading spirit of his work is a calm and equable faith which is indeed unattainable and perhaps undesired by us. A poet whose characters are often purely abstract conceptions, unhumanly great alike in their virtues and their vices; a poet whose songs neither sweep our hearts with rushing storms of passion, nor lull us with their swooning sweetness, can hope for scanty audience to-day. And yet signs are not wanting that the artistic temper of the age is undergoing change, for the poetry of passion must in a large measure share the transience of its theme; and though in the works of those modern poets who have sung of this most sweetly there is much of abiding splendour, there is also much of which the world must soon weary. To immortalize the dream of an instant, to stay the dying glory of an afternoon, are things indeed possible to art; but it is always pertinent to enquire if the dream be of things high and holy, and if the day be fit to remain in our memory as a landmark. If these conditions be not fulfilled, then let the dream dissolve and the sunset die. It is no disparagement of the vital beauty of contemporary poetry to say that much of it already show, signs of wear. It deals largely with mere interludes and swiftly-passing phases of feeling, which can have but little value beyond that derived from the skill with which they are analysed or the beauty with which they are sung." Later on Mr. Thompson formulates in happily-chosen words a truth too often lost sight of:—"The greatest artist cares little to enforce a moral, still less to preconceive a story to that end, knowing that if he will but set forth his vision of life truly and simply there shall be found ample store of the loftiest teaching not less weighty for its subtlety and unconsciousness." With regard to the last half of this sentence, it is only necessary to add that the rule applies only to great artists. The "vision of life" seen by second-rate minds needs to be considerably modified ere its presentation can be called "Art."

When a few years ago there appeared in the Contemporary Review an article on "The Origin of Music" signed "J. F. Rowbotham," every musician felt that a powerful and original thinker had joined the far too scanty ranks of competent musical investigators. When, a little later, that article was seen to be but the preliminary chapter of a History of the Art, in which views of great daring and novelty were set forth with a brilliancy and picturesque force quite unusual in treatises of the kind, the author's name became a power in the musical world. The appearance, therefore, of an article from his pen in the current number of the National Review, would justify a notice here of its teaching, even were its intrinsic importance small. As it is, "The place of Music in Culture," gives not only additional proofs of its author's originality, and of the freshness with which he treats his subjects, but inculcates invaluable lessons, all the more wholesome for being derived from the ancient Greeks, a little of whose spirit is sorely needed in our discordant nineteenth century life. To those familiar with the History to which allusion has been made, the article in question will be recognized as a modernized version of the doctrines taught by Pythagoras, upon which Mr. Rowbotham lays so much stress in his second volume. The specific art known to moderns by the name of "Music"—i.e. symmetry, order, and proportion expressed by means of sound—is in this view considered as but one manifestation of that harmonious adjustment to which all beauty, whether æsthetic, moral, or other, owes its origin. Mr. Rowbotham thinks that the spreading of musical culture tends to influence character by developing the instinct for FORM, and quotes the saying of Pythagoras, that "Music ensures the power of Form to Thought, engenders the instinct of Social Tact, and invites to Tranquility of Soul;" and that of Plato, that "Music naturally shades off into the love of Beauty," in support of his contention. It is however to his concluding remarks that we would specially draw attention:—"It is among the laity rather than with professional musicians, that we should expect such results, and look for the telling influence of music. The latter represent, rather, objective music: they carry on the skill, and are the repositories of the knowledge; they show us where music may be found when we want it. But they are by no means eligible instances of the effects of music, for the exclusive cultivation of the art, or indeed of anything, deprives such thing of its general and liberalizing value. Music, to have its full and fair effect, must be superadded to a liberal life . . . . it must insinuate itself into culture, not serve as a substitute, and there must be culture existent for it to play amidst."

But there is another musical article in the National Review.—"Can a National School of Opera exist?" to which the signature of Florence Lane-Fox is appended. It affords the strongest possible contrast to that of Mr. Rowbotham. He points out an ideal to which we may at least aspire; the lady does her best to show that music being a trade that must be made to pay, and English musical taste being by no means high, it follows that we must adapt ourselves to its level! The possibility of effecting an improvement in that taste is not even hinted. "Remunerative employment" is the goal indicated. Alas! we have not been called "a nation of shopkeepers" for nothing. A jeremiad on the preference shown for foreign artists occupies a considerable space—it has not yet dawned on the authoress, apparently, that the foreign mediocrities in our midst are but reaping what their great predecessors have sown; for it takes perhaps longer to lose a reputation than to gain it. Let no young aspirant to artistic honours however imagine that a desire to "get on" will ever make an artist of him—or her. Art is one thing. "Remunerative employment" depends upon quite other than artistic conditions. It is surely obvious that the greater the number of talented artists, the less "remunerative" will be their "employment." There are, of course, far too many "professional" musicians; by and by it will be seen that proficiency in music need not necessitate its exercise as a means of livelihood, but is worth acquiring for its own sake. The authoress of this inspiring article asserts also that the more cultured among English music-lovers care little for the Opera. "They infinitely prefer Concerts and Oratorio . . . English Opera as a form of entertainment has never been popular." It does not seem to have struck the writer that those whose tastes are equal to high-class Concerts and Oratorios require something better than the average Opera—English Opera especially—has to offer. Some day, perhaps, when Operatic music has made good its claim to rank with Symphony, Sonata, and Oratorio, it will be seen, we fancy, that the nation which gave birth to a Shakespeare is not altogether insensible to the attraction of a good musical-drama. The success of "Lohengrin," "Faust," and other works which contain music in the best sense of the word, not merely strings of pretty tunes, should long ago have made this plain. That "the masses" do not care for high-class Opera is undoubtedly true; but neither do they care for high-class Concerts. Those whose operatic fare consists of Ballads and pretty dance tunes, set to a more or less amusing Comedy, patronize Ballad Concerts, or those, at least, in which ballads and drawing-room songs form the chief attractions.

Love for music is strong enough in this dear old land of ours, but the neglect of years has prevented the development of discrimination. There is a tree of knowledge for music, as for everything else, and its fruit must be eaten—aye, and digested!—before the difference between good and evil becomes plain.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The orchestral poem in which Mendelssohn has embodied his impressions of Italy was the pièce de resistance on Wednesday. By its broad well-marked phrases, its wealth of genial, lightsome, vigorous, easily apprehended tune, and the felicitous transparency of its contrapuntal treatment, the "Italian" symphony is almost the beau ideal of a classical work suited to the needs of a popular audience. It may indeed be confidently asserted of Mendelssohn's music as a whole that, more than any master's, it has been the means of dispelling the prejudice of thousands whose fear of what is known as "classical" music rested on a notion that the epithet was applicable only to what was dry and dull. A highly promising début was made by Miss Madge Wickham, a young violinist (who wore a gold medal), in Spohr's familiar Concerto, No. 8. Though a little too fond of the portamento, Miss Wickham played with much taste and feeling, her rendering of the slow movement being especially commendable. Mr. Arthur Friedheim gave a refined but rather colourless rendering of Weber's "Concertstuck." Warmth and breadth seemed wanting. Miss Alice Whitacre, who was heard in Mozart's Romanza, "Mia Speranza Adorata," has a good voice and style, but makes too much use of "head notes." Her execution of the staccato passages towards the close was very good and her intonation excellent. Mr. Sims Reeves deserves a word of thanks for his frustration of the nefarious designs of the encore fiend, by a repetition of the last verse of Mendelssohn's "Hunting Song" instead of the substitution of another composition. Whenever, wherever, whatever, and however Mr. Sims Reeves may sing, it seems to be taken for granted that he must oblige again with another song. Mr. Crowe conducted with judgment and care.

LETTER VII.

MY LORD,

From what has been said of the foregoing classes, it is evident that none of them are at all calculated to express any emotion which approaches to agitation. Their peculiar characteristics, dignity, tenderness, elegance, are suitable to the more temperate and finer feelings; their subject, in short, is sentiment rather than passion. This last, however, affords yet a very wide field for musical expression; and, perhaps, it is not going too far to say, that the more violent the passion, the more apt the expression of it is to receive additional energy from the power of music. The kind of airs which go under the general denomination of aria parlante is that whose peculiar province is to express violent emotions of all kinds. As, on the one hand, the necessary connection between the subject of the portamento, the cantabile, and the aria di mezzo carattere, with the respective length of notes, and, of consequence, slowness of measure, which has been mentioned as characteristic of each of these classes, is evident; so on the other hand, the incompatibility of emotions, in any degree violent, with slow and deliberate utterance, is equally evident. The circumstance, from which this class takes its denomination, being the acceleration of speech, common to all emotions whatever of the impetuous kind, it comprehends, of consequence, a vast variety with respect both to quality and degree:—It may be said, to take up expression just where the aria di mezzo carattere leaves it. Some airs of this last class, of the liveliest cast, may approach indeed so near to some of the parlante of the least agitated kind, that it might, perhaps, be difficult to say to which class they belonged; but, as soon as the expression begins to be in any degree impetuous, the distinction is evident, as the degree of passion to be expressed increases, the air assumes the name of aria agitata, aria di strepito, aria infuriata. Expressions of fear, of joy, of grief, of rage, when at all impetuous, to their highest and most frantic degrees, are all comprehended under the various subdivisions of the class.—Their rhythm has its peculiar province, the effect of this kind of airs depending, perhaps, chiefly on its powers. The instrumental parts are here likewise of great efficacy, particularly in the expression of the more violent passions, giving, by the addition of a great body of sound, and by the distinctness and rapidity of their execution, a force and energy to the whole, which could never be the effect of a voice alone, however flexible, however powerful; and if it be allowed that the beating of a drum has, in consequence of certain principles of sound and rhythm, a considerable effect on the mind, and that ten drums have a proportionably greater effect than one, it must, I apprehend, be also allowed that sounds more beautiful and as distinct, nay, infinitely more capable, from their duration, to mark the rhythm by distinguishing pause from length of note, must have a similar effect on the mind,—finer, however, and more powerful, in proportion to their superior beauty, accuracy, and other advantages. The instruments here, far from being restricted to the mere support of the voice, are called in to co-operate with it in producing one and the same effect, but with greater power than that which could be produced by the voice alone.

I am well aware, it may be objected here, that the greater the force of the instruments the more they will be apt to overpower the voice, and, of consequence, to destroy the principal source of expression, namely, the sense of connection between the words and the notes; and, perhaps, it may not be very easy to convince those who are not conversant with music, how it is possible this should not be the case. All those, however, who have been accustomed to hear good music well performed, will be satisfied, on recollection, that, in this kind of airs, they have often heard a very numerous orchestra exert all its powers, without in the least covering the voice, or disguising the sense: And the reason is simply this, that what is called the "fortissimo," or extreme force of the orchestra, is not continued uniformly throughout the accompaniment, which would, indeed, have the effect of completely drowning the voice,—but that this extreme exertion is instantaneously called forth, either in those particular notes which are peculiarly significant of the rhythm, such as the first of the bar, &c., or on some note or notes where the sense itself requires it; after which the piano or hush of the orchestra immediately takes place, bearing the voice, excepting in such instantaneous lightnings of sound, if I may be allowed the expression, eminently superior throughout, nor ever playing for any length of time with the same continued, or with increasing force, excepting in the case of some climax in the expression, where the words have either been already heard, or in which, at least, their sense, even were they not distinctly heard, cannot, from the general tenor of the air, be mistaken.

EMIL NAUMANN.

To the Editor of the MUSICAL WORLD.

SIR,—In the Musical Times for last month the death of this eminent musical historian is stated to have taken place at Leipzig on the 27th June; in the Musical Record of the same date, at Dresden, on the 23rd June. For the sake of historical accuracy, will any of your readers kindly inform me which of the conflicting statements, if either, is correct?

I am, sir,
Your obedient servant,
I. I. N. C. RUMSEY.

MADAME MARIE ROZE AT SHEFFIELD.

(From the Sheffield and Rotherham Independent).

"Owing to the enterprise of Mr. W. Brown, who had entered into an arrangement with Colonel H. Mapleson and Mr. N. Vert, Madame Marie Roze included Sheffield in the list of English towns to be visited previous to her farewell tour round the world. The fact that last night would probably be the only chance of hearing the favourite prima donna was all potent to draw a very large house, the orchestra being called upon to accommodate the extra crush in the gallery. Madame Roze was supported by a company of artists who, if not equal to the diva herself, were highly capable.

Madame Roze was, of course, the chief feature of the evening. She was heartily welcomed when she made her appearance, and still warmer demonstrations rewarded her after each song. In "Softly Sighs," she displayed great dramatic force and brilliant vocalisation, her impassioned delivery of the last phrase bringing down the house. She responded with a characteristic rendering of "Comin' Thro' the Rye." Watson's "All in a Garden Fair" was followed by "The Last Rose of Summer." It was in the Habanera, however, that she secured her greatest success, her abandon of manner and play of feature being replete with high dramatic instinct, and denoting an actress "to the manner born." The demonstrations which followed this display were renewed when the opening strains of her encore song—"I Dreamt I Dwelt"—were played over, and at its close she was honoured with a recall. Madlle. Desvignes is a contralto of very creditable powers, her voice being good in its upper range, and musical withal. The florid aria of Meyerbeer enabled her to show the results of some excellent training, her cadenza being particularly good. She was encored, and sang "Darby and Joan" with much feeling, and in response to her next solo she gave a capital rendering of the "Bailiff's Daughter of Islington." Signor Pasini has a voice of considerable power and range, and although it was at times hard and unsympathetic, he so pleased the audience with "Dormi pure," that he was rewarded with a hearty encore, which he accepted by singing the favourite tenor air from "Rigoletto." Signor Abramoff was a decided feature of the concert, his full, powerful voice and vigorous, pointed singing gaining well deserved recognition. He was most successful in the excerpts from "Ernani" and "Faust." The instrumentalists came in for no small amount of commendation for their part of the programme, the clear, full tone, firm, graceful bowing, neat harmonics, and the correct double stopping of the violinist, winning admiration from all who heard him, and gaining for Signor Simonetti hearty recalls. Signor Bisaccia proved himself a fine accompanist, and in the Caprice his extraordinary executive powers were manifest; the wide leaps, full chords, brilliant scale passages, arpeggios, and contrasts of tone—varying from what imaginative minds call the trombone to flute—all combining to rouse up the enthusiasm of the audience, which he appeased by playing a "Galop de Concert," of his own composing. Altogether the concert was a decided success.

ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS.

You are kindly requested to write for Ainsworth's "New Patent Organ Pedal Combination List." Ainsworth's "New Patent" is perfectly unique and may be combined easily with any Piano. It is the only one which may be safely combined with any Piano without deteriorating the instrument. Having put down at my works two engines and machinery of the most desirable kind, I am now supplying my goods at a price which enables every organist and organ student to have always ready for use in his Studio an

ORGAN PEDAL PIANO,

Affording Perfectly Unique Pedal Practice.

34, Sheen Park, Richmond.

Dear Sir,—I have deferred writing to comment upon your Pedals and Action now attached to my pianoforte until I could satisfy myself of their utility and efficiency. I can now conscientiously say that they more than fulfil all my anticipations. Although I am no carpenter, aided by your lucid diagram I had little difficulty in attaching them myself, and it is impossible to over-estimate the comfort they give to me, or to conceive the saving of time one experiences in one's own room.—Believe me, yours truly,

To Mr. Ainsworth. BURNHAM HORNER, F.R. Hist. S.

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to bear testimony to the perfection of your invention. I am more than satisfied with your Patent Action and Organ Pedals, and consider them worth double the money. Organists and organ students who desire to improve in the Art of Pedalling, which is so essential to a good organist, will do well to procure a set. I have seen no Action half so effective, and one can sit at the piano and play, "Fixed in his everlasting seat," or any other organ music or organ arrangement, with the greatest pleasure. The touch of pedals could not be better, and the action is, as you say, "Absolutely free from annoyances." They cannot be too highly recommended, as by their use, rapid progress is certain.—Believe me, sincerely yours, I. B. THORNTON,
Organist, Birstall, Leeds.

Cologne, July 16th, 1886.

My Dear Sir,—I have much pleasure in informing you that your Pedals have given the fullest satisfaction. I have them combined with my practice piano. Many of my musical friends who have seen them, as well as my organ pupils, are quite delighted with them; and I must acknowledge that I have never met with any Pedals so noiseless and pleasant to play upon as yours. The Action I consider durable, and of very good workmanship. Every organist who desires to perfect his playing will welcome your invention. I can recommend your goods in every respect.—Yours truly, Herr J. RODENKIRCHEN.
To John Ainsworth, Esq. Organist, The Cathedral, Cologne, Germany.

TOOLS.—In order to facilitate the attachment, a complete set of tools are sent (four in number), each one marked for its particular use. By the use of these tools, and following carefully the directions, ANY ONE can make a really good attachment.

Facts and Comments.

On Friday night Covent Garden Theatre was the scene of a proceeding happily unique in musical history. Mr. Sims Reeves, who has been singing at the Promenade Concerts with a success which recalled his best days, made on that night his farewell appearance for the present season. The occasion was therefore one of interest, and the management, in order, presumably, to add lustre and significance thereto, advertised that the concert would be attended by Ally Sloper and his eminent family. We shall not recount any details of the proceedings of that evening; they are best unrecorded, though they will scarcely be forgotten. But it may, perhaps, be not wholly useless to offer to Mr. Freeman Thomas a word of remonstrance. We have always acknowledged the artistic sincerity which seemed to actuate the management of these concerts; but this lamentable scene must be the last of its kind. By a repetition of so unworthy a proceeding Mr. Thomas will entirely forfeit all claims to the serious attention of artists.

We understand that Signor Arditi has been engaged by Mr. Augustus Harris for the next season of opera, as co-conductor with Signor Mancinelli, in place of Mr. Randegger.

The hearts of schoolgirls and servant-maids have been greatly disturbed lately by the peripatetic musicians who, giving themselves out as disguised noblemen, have done such good business in the organ-grinding way. Viscount Hinton, one of the most distinguished of these gentlemen, has recently been interviewed by a London journalist, and the nobleman unfolded a woeful tale. Thus runs the tearful story:—

> "He says he is the eldest son of Earl Poulett, and at present earns his living by grinding a piano-organ in front of public and other houses. He is of medium size, and is 39 years of age. His well-oiled black ringlets and a slight nervousness gave him the appearance of a musician of indifferent fortune, and he has dissipated altogether any aristocratic tone he may have possessed "I was engaged at the Surrey Theatre at one time," said he. "I hired a piano-organ about five weeks ago, and hung upon it a card bearing the following words: 'I am Viscount Hinton, eldest son of Lord Poulett. I have adopted this as a means of obtaining an honest living, my father having refused to assist me, through no fault of my own. See Burke's and Debrett's Peerages. I have now a fixed route for each day in the week. Persons will come out of a crowd and interview me. They ask me why I don't get a situation. I say simply, 'Get me a situation,' and then, as a rule, they turn away with a shake of the head. Pulling the organ along is rather hard work, but I am going to get a donkey. Working men come up to me and say, shaking me by the hand, 'I glory in your pluck, old man—keep it up. Here's tuppence for you.' In Knight's-road, Chelsea, I met some people from the Crewkerne estate. A woman, 'Edith Graham, the Tipster,' who has a troupe of performing dogs, asked me to join her, but at the first rehearsal, in a side street, the dogs became unruly, so we dissolved partnership by mutual consent. I have not seen my father since Oct. 3, 1871."

Here is a picture that must appeal to the most hardened heart. Imagine a peer being presented with twopence to go into the next street. Can nothing be done for the sufferer? The House (of Lords) would surely consult its own dignity by bringing in a bill for the relief of Viscount Hinton and his brother peers in distress, who should "process' in a body, organs, monkeys, and all, to Westminster, and demonstrate in Palace Yard. But could not the aristocratic musicians earn their bread in some less aggressive way—say, as "needy knife grinders?' Perhaps knife-grinding is harder work, and requires a little more special training; but then, it does not make so much noise.

In acknowledgement of her excellent performances at Bayreuth, Fraulein Malten has received from Madame Wagner a complete edition of the master's literary works in a binding de luxe, and an Arabian pillow from Wagner's collection of antiquities. It is over 300 years old, and is ornamented with costly embroidery of a characteristic pattern. The profane will, no doubt, avail themselves of the easy witticism suggested by the gift of Wagner's works accompanied by a pillow.

Vast as is the literature which has accumulated around musical instruments, there were, until a few days ago, two instruments which had been shamefully neglected by historians and critics. The first was the banjo, the second the coach horn. To a writer in Truth is due the credit of praising the banjo in a worthy manner. The instrument, in some sort the Cinderella of the orchestra, had been too long treated with neglect and contumely, as a thing fit only for the humble nigger. It is gratifying, however, to learn that "Society" is awaking to a sense of its responsibility in this matter, and that the banjo is rapidly taking that position amongst the musical aristocracy to which its extensive compass, deep emotional qualities, and large repertoire, entitle it. The Prince of Wales, we learn from the writer in question, is an excellent performer on the banjo, and so good is his ear, that on returning from the opera or opera-bouffe, he can pick out all the best tunes with astonishing facility. And, as we had occasion to remark a short time since, the G.O.M. himself is wont to enliven the cold shades of opposition with the dulcet twangling of the banjo. Altogether, the prospects of the banjo are improving. All that is now needed is that a "banjo, gules" should be added to the Royal Standard, and that henceforth the letters "G.O.M." should be interpreted as "Grand old Minstrel."

But if the banjo is the Cinderella, what shall be said of the coach-horn? It has indeed, the melancholy gratification of knowing that it has been regarded hitherto as a solo instrument exclusively, and that it has never reached the degradation of playing in a band with a score of other tonal weapons. But then it has shared this doubtful dignity with the barrel-organ, the Jew's harp, and the tooth-comb; and its sole comfort has been to arouse the inhabitants of Piccadilly with its powerful blasts, distinguished rather by force than sweetness or variety, and to evoke the wondering admiration of the gate-riding rustic. But at last a gentleman, whose nom de plume is "The Old Guard," has written a book upon the Coach-horn, which is intended to serve as an instructor to all those coaching amateurs who desire to acquire the mastery of this highly emotional instrument. "Some people," says this entertaining and elegant writer, "can sound a horn almost by instinct from childhood, others experience an insurmountable difficulty, and fabulous sums have been offered to me by certain persons if I could make them blow as well as myself." The chief secret of the art appears to be in the position of the lips, which must be shaped as though they were trying to spit a hair from the mouth. We congratulate the coach-horn on its good fortune in possessing so excellent an exponent as "The Old Guard."

Whether the members of Mr. Barnby's Albert Hall Choir will sing any better—if, indeed, that be possible—for the new name of "Royal Choral Society" which has been conferred on them by the Queen, remains to be proved. The ingenious Mr. Shakspere once made a remark about the nomenclature of roses, which seems not inappropriate. At any rate, the prospectus for the approaching season shows no falling-off in interest. The first concert, as already announced in these columns, will take place on November 7, when Mozart's "Requiem" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" will be given. On the 28th of the same month Cowen's "Ruth" will be performed, and the next work of any unusual interest will be Peter Benoit's "Lucifer" on January 16. Mr. Barnby's own "The Lord is King" and Signor Mancinelli's "Isaias" will be given on February 20, and the rest of the programme contains such favourite works "The Golden Legend," "The Redemption," Berlioz's "Faust," the "Elijah," and the "Messiah." The list of vocalists is a strong one, including as it does Mesdames Albani, Nordica, Scalchi, Belle Cole, Patey; Messrs. Lloyd, Henschel, Hilton, and Watkin Mills. The names of Mr. Hensler, a tenor, Mr. Blauwaert, Signor Del Puente, and Signor Abramoff are, if we mistake not, new as far as Mr. Barnby's choir is concerned. General satisfaction will be felt at the appointment of Mr. W. Hodge, who, as deputy-organist, has done such efficient work, to the post of organist, made vacant by the retirement of Sir John Stainer.

Athough, pace Mr. Ruskin, the effect of machinery on the world has made for good rather than for ill, we have never been able to discover any value in mechanical music, as it has hitherto been procurable. Its effect on the minds of the higher class is irritating to a degree; and the pleasure which, according to ingenious advertisers, it brings into the courts and alleys of the poor would be of a far worthier kind if brought by some wandering minstrel; whose efforts, however humble, would at least be tinged with some human feeling. The latest news from that land of wonders, America, however, opens up the prospect of a revolution in the matter of music by machinery, which may eventually affect as great a change in our musical, as the printing-press achieved in our literary, culture. The phonograph, as our readers already know, has recently come to the front in a most remarkable way, and the latest move of the arch-inventor, Mr. Edison, shews that he is fully alive to the capabilities of his bantling, and does not intend to let its education be neglected. The child is shortly to be put upon a diet which, if healthy, cannot be strictly be regarded as food for babes, and is indeed of Gargantuan solidity. This infan is to be fed on "Masses and Fugues and Ops.,"—at any rate, that is what we gather from the following:—

> Mr. Edison has ordered a purchase of specimen musical instruments of every description manufactured in Europe, each to be of the undoubtedly best quality and to be selected by the highest musical authorities; the instruments thus selected are to be performed upon in the presence of the phonograph by the best musicians obtainable. Phonograms of music thus made are to be sent to Mr. Edison. The musical record in each case to be preceded by the name of the composition, the address of its publisher and the name of the performer, to be followed by the name of the manufacturer and the price of the instrument. The instruments adopted after these tests will be employed to make phonograms in every variety and in large numbers for the purpose of furnishing phonogram cabinets, which will be sent out to all parts of the world with the phonograph. The first of these musical mills will be established in England under the superintendence of a well-known musical director, to be appointed by Colonel Gouraud, whose agent is already engaged in finding suitable premises in some central part of London. All new music worthy of reproduction will be thus phonographically published. Readers of prose, poetry, and the drama will find similar employment in the same establishment. Already some hundreds of thousands of phonograms are on order.

Should these experiments be successful, what may not be expected to result? In the year 2,000, amateurs will go to the music-shops of the day, and order blandly "Rubinstein reading of the Waldstein Sonata, it must be on a Bechstein," or "Mendelssohn's Concerto, by Sarasate." But an act of parliament should be passed, forbidding the phonographisation (any hybrid word is lawful in science) of performances less than first rate. Imagine the result on the ear and taste of posterity, if the modern ballad-monger, or the piano-grinder, or the drawing-room singer, were allowed to perpetuate his, or her, monstrosities!

Among the opera-houses of Germany, that of Dresden appears to be rapidly rising into the first place. An admirable series of performances of the whole of Wagner's "Ring des Nibelungen," given without any cuts, has justbeen completed there, and the management has now engaged all the soloists who took part in this year's performance of "Die Meistersinger" at Bayreuth. If this goes on, Wagner-worshippers will have some difficulty in deciding whether they should go to Bayreuth or Dresden. The authorities at Bayreuth must be on their mettle; for it is no secret that—except from a financial point of view—the performances at the last Festival did not reach that standard of perfection which we have learned to expect. After all, Bayreuth has but two unique advantages—its theatre, and its traditions. The first it will of course retain; the other, it seems a little in danger of losing, unless the authorities will take warning in time. That they will do so, must be the hope of every musician, for the Bayreuth Festival is the one serious and well-considered attempt of the civilised world to realise ideal perfection,

THE CHARITY CONCERT.

However, the nearer we approached to the South, the gayer and more picturesque towns became. Certainly it was less beautiful than my country, and I would have freely given all the cities proudly admiring their reflections in the Rhone for my own village, which bathes its feet so modestly in the waters of the Creuse; but I must admit that it was beautiful, after all. Towards the end of April, on a warm and golden summer-like night, Bergère, the cart, Jacques, his pipe, and I made a triumphal entry into Carpentras. This is a charming town which shares—why, I know not—with Breves-la-Gaillarde, Pézenas, and Landernau, the privilege of supplying all the fools and simpletons whom literature sacrifices for the amusement of the public. I do not know Landernau, or Pézenas, or Breves-la-Gaillarde, but I am ready to affirm that Carpentras, at the foot of Mount Ventou, hidden in its encircling battlemented ramparts, like a partridge in a pie-crust, is one of the most poetic of the French towns which roast in the southern sun. We got down at the hotel of "The Three Mewing Cats." Upon a signboard a local artist had painted three cats in a state of ecstasy difficult to describe, who seemed to be executing the most infernal trio you can possibly imagine.

We had scarcely alighted when we saw signs of an excitement which could hardly be customary. Animated groups were standing in front of the hotel and the theatre square. There seemed to be, mingled with the spirit of springtime, a certain air of festivity in the atmosphere. Carriages were arriving from all parts, and crossing and recrossing continually. Obviously preparations for something strange and pleasant were going on of which we were ignorant; for Bergère, friend Jacques, and I were too completely unknown, and too modest also, to suppose that these crowds and the excitement were on account of our passage through the town. It was plain that they were expecting a prince of the blood, or an actor in character.

The dinner bell rudely interrupted the comments in which we indulged for some moments. At the table d'hôte I saw, for the first time, a new kind of biped of whose existence I had not even dreamed till then, M. Buffon and the other naturalists having omitted to mention them in their histories. Jacques informed me that these bizarre beings were bagmen. They told us that a concert was to be given that evening in the theatre at Carpentras for the benefit of the poor. A Concert! At the word I glowed with pleasure, seeing which my friend Jacques began to grow pale with fear, for there were two things in the world for which he had a profound hatred—the first being his wife, and the second, music. Music was the only point upon which our opinions differed.

I ought to say that a concert was a rare thing then in the provinces. At that time, musical education in France had hardly begun. And for my own part, I had heard no other concerts than those of the birds in our woods. Since then we have made rapid progress in this respect, and France has become at least as musical as Germany.* Music madness has seized everybody, and it is hard to say where the disease will stop. There is not in our departments a single town of four thousand inhabitants which has not its weekly amateur concert, and at all hours of every day two or three hundred fists, occupied in strumming the keyboard of that soulless, heartless instrument, called a piano. It is a craze, a disease. Lately I revisited my village. Formerly, not twenty years ago, there was only one harpsichord, that of my godmother. I still can see her smooth white fingers wandering over the ivory keys. I still hear her sad, sweet voice, singing the old airs from "Richard." But now I found my home infested with pianos, cornets, enormous basses, colossal trumpets, and other mammoth instruments. The day of my arrival, there was a concert at the mayor's house; the next day, some people serenaded the opposition deputy. Heaven forgive me! I would wager that to-day my old nurse's daughter has a piano, and my foster-brother plays the flute or the clarionet. Formerly Toinette used to sing the country airs in patois, and François made us dance on Sundays in the village green, to the music of his bagpipe. You may be quite sure that already music has killed many good things which were hardly less valuable. It has killed comedy, tragedy, the drama, the theatre. For the pleasures of the intellect, which always required a certain amount of work, it has substituted a recreation which calls for nothing of the sort. To enjoy it, you need only keep your ears open. In the family, the piano first killed silence and solitude, then the love of books, and the readings which used to beguile the weary winter nights.

To-day concerts are an amusement general and vulgar enough, within the reach of everybody; they are given by the dozen. I do not speak only of Paris, where, of course, they swarm; I speak also of the provinces, where you can hardly pass between two rows of houses without having a sonata hurled down your throat. But when I was travelling with my friend Jacques in the cart drawn by Bergère, a concert was an event, a rare and solemn thing. One prepared for it three months' beforehand, and when the great day had come, there was from all parts a concourse like that which crowded Carpentras at the time of which I am speaking. I must tell you all about it. At this charity concert one had the chance of hearing several distinguished amateurs from the department and neighbourhood, amonst others, a flageolet player of Tarascon, of whom they spoke wonders. But the chief attraction and enticement, the real charm of the fete, was the Countess de R——. who had promised to help with her grace, her beauty, her voice, and her talent.

* This, of course, must not be taken au serieux.—ED.

Now, there was about the Comtesse de R—— a whole history, which was of course told in very different fashions. Here the strange creatures whom Jacques called bagmen enjoyed themselves immensely, and allowed themselves a host of subtle jokes and ingenious pleasantries which I do not know how to repeat properly. Nevertheless, what I heard piqued my curiosity immensely. I learned that the Comtesse de R—— had been, some years before, a celebrated singer; her name, which oblivion has not swallowed, still to-day resounds, with the names of Pasla and Catalani, like an Æolian harp. Not being able to make her his mistress, the Comte de R—— had made her his wife. The gossips added that, being a zealous lover as well as a stern husband, he had, after carrying her from the theatre, kept her in his château, where the ill-fated victim was dying of regret, sadness, and weariness.

Perhaps these were only fables invented for amusement. Certain is it that during the three years the Countess had lived at the place she had scarcely been seen. If some praised her youth and beauty, there were others who affirmed that she was anything but young and beautiful. Others, again, pretended that she had lost her voice after a few months of marriage. To the sole end of knowing the truth about all these questions, the neighbourhood, which, otherwise had no love for the Count de R., on account of his vast fortune, his great name, his proud temperament, and his good manners (I learned all this later), the neighbourhood, I say, had conceived the idea of giving a concert in aid of the poor, and of entreating the Comtesse de R—— to assist the charitable work. The truth is that the "charity" counted for nothing in this good work; it was nothing more than a pretext for getting at the mysterious chatelaine, a bait held out by the gossips and mischief-makers, who were not sorry at the same time to remind the Count that he had married a singer, and to show him that others were in the secret of his mésalliance.

A deputation of the leading people accordingly went to the château. To their great disappointment, they were not granted access to the Comtesse; but the Count received them with the utmost politeness, and hastened to promise his wife's assistance in the charitable cause. The news quickly spread for miles round, and in this was to be found the reason why the people were coming from all parts to the entertainment.

It was needless to think of persuading Jacques to take a ticket. At the bare idea that there was to be music at Carpentras he wanted to harness Bergère and escape as fast as possible—and, indeed, I had much trouble in dissuading him from doing so. As eight o'clock struck he went to bed, and I, led by the crowd, took my way, free and happy, to the theatre. The hall was already full. The performers and their instruments occupied the stage, decorated with flowers and wreaths of foliage. A piano, intended for the use of the Comtesse, was placed near the footlights in front of the audience. Everyone was in his seat; there was only one thing lacking—the Comtesse. Already people were enquiring anxiously; the glances of all wandered here and there; the Comtesse did not appear. After an hour of fruitless waiting, just as murmurs of impatience were beginning to go round the hall, the orchestra commenced.

They played first the overture to La Caravane. I found the execution perfect, and the effect was magical. I had never supposed till then that with live men such an effect could be produced. Flutes, violins, basses, clarionets, vied with each other in energy and spirit. I perspired most copiously in sympathy. I need not tell you that this morceau was received with frantic applause; the mothers, sisters, wives, and cousins of the performers sobbed enough to split a stone, and wept like open taps. When it was over all eyes began once more to seek the Comtesse de R——, but there was no Comtesse.

Reviews.

THE MAPLESON MEMOIRS.

The fascination exercised by books of memoirs is proverbial. They are not only amusing and exceedingly "easy" reading, but throw much light on public events which, until we are admitted behind the scenes, often seem difficult of explanation. They not only exhibit for us our heroes and heroines en robe de chambre, but they promise, and very often supply, choice bits of scandal, welcome alike to the raconteur and the jaded palate of the modern reader. Unfortunately a preliminary study of Psychology not being thought indispensable to memoir writing, the difference between memory and imagination is not always clearly kept in view in such productions; and the public being very lenient with regard to veracity when its amusement is well provided for, writers have every temptation to take for their motto "Si non e vero e ben trovato," especially when the facts they offer tend to the advancement of their own pet schemes. But if this be borne in mind, memoir-reading may be included among harmless and indeed useful occupations. Take for instance the memoirs of a good showman—what can be more instructive? We see what fools we are, for one thing—or perhaps it would be more correct to say we see what fools our neighbours are, for we of course are never taken in; we see how poor a chance there is for merit if it be not well pushed, advertised, and "puffed"; we learn the modus operandi of various little artifices for manipulating that great baby the public; and we see how successfully Art can be utilized as a cloak for commercial speculation.

The latest addition to this literature comes in the form of two handsome volumes, the fruit of Colonel Mapleson's forty years' experience as an Impresario. Published but yesterday (the 21st), the book will shortly be in every one's hands. It has all the elements of wide popularity: it abounds with racy stories, the chief actors in which are public favourites and personages of more or less celebrity in the operatic world, and it contains vivid pictures of the ups and downs with which the name of Mapleson is, in both hemispheres, so closely identified. All this is told in a pleasant chatty style, free from attempts at fine writing, and leaving little to be desired on the score of candour. In this respect indeed, Mr. Mapleson seems to have had misgivings, for in his preface he says:—"Some of my plain statements of facts will not, I fear, be fully appreciated by the personages to whom they refer; and in case they should feel offended by my frankness, I ask their pardon beforehand, convinced that they will readily accord it." We are not so sure, mais passons!

It may not be generally known that Mr. Mapleson began his career as a practical musician, studying for two years at the Royal Academy of Music. The violin at this time was his principal instrument, but he subsequently received singing lessons from Gardoni and Belletti, who led him to believe he had the making of a primo tenore in him. After studying for three years in Italy under Mazzucato he made his first appearance on any stage at Lodi, as Carlo in Linda di Chamouni. Returning to London early in 1854, his throat became affected, and after an operation Mr. Mapleson found himself "deprived alike of tonsils, uvula, and voice. My path had now been marked out for me. For the future I might be a musical agent, a concert director or an impresario; but not a vocalist."

"In the year 1856, I started a musical agency in the Haymarket, the first established in London. Both Mr. Lumley and Mr. Gye applied to me for singers. As I was well-known in Italy numbers of artists inscribed their names on my books. I did a good business and was making a large income."

How Mr. Mapleson first undertook the formation of an opera company must be read in the book itself. In 1858, he opened at Drury Lane, his conductor being Signor Vianesi. For the following year "two conductors had been engaged, Signor Arditi and Mr. (afterwards Sir) Julius Benedict. Both were excellent, but neither wished to be mistaken for the other. Both, moreover, were bald, and I remember on one occassion when a grand combined performance was to take place, Benedict going into the prima donna's dressing-room, taking up a brush and carefully arranging his scanty hair so as to cover as much as possible of his denuded cranium. 'What are you about?' I asked. 'Nothing particular,' he replied, 'only I don't want whilst wielding the bâton to be mistaken for Arditi.' Soon afterwards Arditi appeared, and with a couple of brushes began operating on his hair so as to leave so much as possible of his bare skull exposed to view. He explained his action by exclaimining, 'I don't want to be mistaken for Benedict.'"

One of the funniest parts of the book is that dealing with the business relations between Mr. Mapleson and the famous Mr. E. T. Smith. On one occasion this enterprising gentleman insisted on the appearance of Sayers and Heenan in a private box as a draw. A week ago perhaps we might have found this difficult to believe, but recent events at Covent Garden have shown that everything is possible. Mr. Smith must also be credited with the exceedingly ingenious proposal to give a "double" performance of Il Trovatore by dividing the stage into two floors and having the opera executed on both floors at the same time.

Colonel Mapleson's unvarnished narratives respecting the production of the new operas will throw light upon a hitherto unsolved question as to why some new works succeed, while others, quite as good, remain for years, perhaps for ever, in obscurity. Had Gounod's Faust been heard only in Paris the rest of the world would doubtless have accepted the opinion that there was "nothing in it but the chorus of soldiers." The apathy of the British public was never perhaps more proved than by the difficulty experienced in getting even a half-filled house to witness Faust, and one cannot but admire the ingenuity of Mr. Mapleson in devising so many schemes in order to bring what he knew was a masterpiece to a hearing. If an argument in favour of Wagner's dramatic flow of melody were wanting we surely have it here:—"The paucity of measured tunes in the opera "Faust," which is melodious from beginning to end, caused many persons to say that it was wanting in melody." Similarly, speaking of the production of Nicolai's charming opera the "Merry Wives of Windsor," Mr. Mapleson says "the opera met with most unequivocal success, and was repeated for several consecutive nights. But, as with so many other operas, the public were so slow in expressing their approbation that it gradually had to drop out of the répertoire." "Yet," says Mr. Mapleson, "the operatic-manager who would prosper must appeal to the public with a very strong company and with new works."

The delicate, yet immensely amusing manner in which the reader of the Memoirs is let into so many little secrets of professional life will be most enjoyable to thousands of people who lose no opportunity of acquiring every scrap of information about the private lives of prime donne, prime tenori, &c. While the extreme and frequently ludicrous excitability of such celebrated persons as Mmes. Patti and Gerster, Nilsson and Titiens, Signori Giuglini and Ravelli will show that it is no easy task to regulate performances with artists whose nerves are perpetually in a state of the highest tension, and whose jealousy of one another is a constant source of anxiety to themselves and their operatic-managers.

Many of the musical celebrities of whom so much is now for the first time made clear to the public having long since "joined the majority," the author is enabled to speak more unreservedly and dispassionately than if they were still among us, and the book, though not intended to "point a moral," will to many rising artists unconsciously do so, and much that may have appeared hard and severe when only half-told, of the regulations introduced by men like Sir Michael Costa and others, will be understood and accounted for.

In the struggles between Mr. Gye and Mr. Mapleson about singers, libretti, &c., Mr. Mapleson seems now to have arrived at that placid state of mind in which he can look back at his operatic battles with almost a feeling of amusement. After the event, people can not only recall details which, at the time, they scarcely perceived, but petty intrigues and miserable deceptions stand out in the memory of the past, their various significations fully revealed.

Alluding to "Lohengrin," Colonel Mapleson says, "I produced various works, notably Wagner's "Lohengrin," in which Mdlle. Titiens, who very kindly undertook the rôle of Ortruda, really excelled herself. This, with Mdlle. Nilsson as Elsa, Campanini as the Knight of the Swan, and Galassi as Telramund, with an increased orchestra under Sir Michael Costa's able direction, caused me to increase the prices of admission, and even then it was impossible to get a seat during the remainder of the season."

THE WAGNER-LISZT CORRESPONDENCE.*

"The aim and endeavour of every true artist must be to acquire a position in which he can occupy himself exclusively with the accomplishment of great works, undisturbed by other vocations or by considerations of economy."—Beethoven (letters).

To THE DIRECTORS OF THE COURT THEATRE.
Vienna, Dec. 1807.

"The undersigned has cause to flatter himself that during the period of his stay in Vienna he has gained some favor and approbation from the highest nobility as well as from the public at large. . . . . Nevertheless he has had difficulties of every kind to contend against, and has not hitherto been so fortunate as to acquire a position that would enable him to live solely for Art, and to develop his talents to a still higher degree of perfection which ought to be the aim of every artist. The mere wish to gain a livelihood has never been the leading clue that has hitherto guided the undersigned on his path; his great aims have been the interest of Art end the ennobling of Taste. . . . . He begs to refer to a hint which Lichnowski was so kind as to give him to the effect that the directors of the theatre were disposed to engage the undersigned on reasonable conditions in the service of their theatre, and to ensure his remaining in Vienna by securing to him a permanent position more propitious to the further exercise of his talents

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN.

We have quoted the above extracts from Beethoven's correspondence with the view of introducing the following extract from a letter of Wagner to Liszt, dated, Venice, January 2, 1859. "Believe me implicitly when I tell you that the only reason for my continuing to live is the irresistible impulse of creating a number of works of Art which have their vital force in me. . . . What I demand is the settlement on me of an honourable and large pension solely for the purpose of creating my works of Art undisturbed and without regard to external success. Being without property or subvention of any kind I have to rely on my operas for my income. He who has real knowledge of the nature of my works, and who feels and esteems their peculiar and differentiating qualities must see that I in my position towards such an institution as our theatre ought to be entirely relieved from the necessity of making commercial articles of my works." Beethoven alas! was less fortunate than Wagner—for him there was no Liszt with ever-ready purse and helpful encouraging words. Alone he fought his way; and who shall say what the world has lost by his loneliness? What the world would have lost had Wagner been as unfortunate as Beethoven may easily be guaged by reading even superficially through this correspondence. Cursed, as of necessity every great artist must be, with a susceptibility which transforms every passing event into an all-engrossing mood, to Richard Wagner earth was always hell or heaven. At one time full of child-like joy because of a little sympathy or appreciation, at another he contemplated with a favourable eye the attractions offered by suicide.

The human weaknesses of the Bayreuth master have supplied his artistic foes with many a shaft, and have even shaken the faith of numbers whose admiration for his work was not supplemented by a knowledge of the special conditions attending artistic manifestation in general. It cannot be too often urged that very great artistic gifts are the result of mental conditions which preclude the existence of a steady well-ordered life, such as the average good citizen should, but by no means always does, exemplify. The greater the artist the more impressionable will he be, and the more liable, of course, to be "upset" by what a common mind would pass as insignificant. Nothing is insignificant to genius. Where others see molehills the genius sees mountains, and this is at once his glory and his misfortune.

Let no more capital be made, then, out of the weaknesses of Richard Wagner. If such faults as he was guilty of are forgiven—as they are every day—to those who add absolutely nothing to the world's happiness or store of beauty, shall they not be overlooked in him? Has the creator of Lohengrin, the Meistersinger, Tristan, Parsifal, no claim on us? How often, too, have we been obliged to hear that "Wagner was his own greatest enemy;" that he was not content with creating, but wished to demolish the work of others. Here again the same obtuseness is evident. If to the ordinary artist or critic the effect of at least two thirds of the art of our time is nauseating, think what effect such things must have on a mind like Richard Wagner's! No wonder that, when despondent, he gave way, or that when strong and hopeful he struck out right and left with his terrible sword—the pen!

Another injustice should here be mentioned. We are told that Richard Wagner's conceit was quite unbearable, that his arrogance and pretentions were beyond the bounds of reason, and so on. Why! the man was simply conscious of his power, and as his mission became gradually clear to him, saw what was wanted for its fulfilment, and endeavoured to obtain the realization of his dream. Had Richard Wagner been a nobody his personal failings would have made him no worse than thousands of men with whom we shake hands without compunction, every year. Having been what hew as these failings should be regarded but as spots on the sun. He who thinks this attitude unreasonable shows conclusively that he does not realise what Wagner has done for art.

CALLIRHOE.

A Dramatc Cantata,

MUSIC BY

J. FREDERICK BRIDGE, Mus. Doc.

Composed expressly for the
BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL, 1888.

PRICE IN PAPER COVER, 2s. 6d.
VOCAL PARTS EACH 1s.

London: Novello, Ewer, & Co.,

Press Opinions:—

The success of Dr. Bridge's cantata is beyond dispute, and we shall probably hear much of it during the approaching season.—Daily Telegraph.

Callirhoe brings to light a native composer who has fancy and originality, in addition to thorough knowledge of the technical means by which these inestimable gifts are calculated to yield artistic benefit.—Chronicle.

Dr. Bridge's new composition will take high rank among his works for he has written it with much knowledge of vocal and instrumental effect, and no small graphic delineation.—Guardian.

Melodic charm and modern harmonic effect—the solos for the soprano are exceptionally pleasing.—Musical World.

Dr. Bridge is anything but a Wagnerite, but he has escaped the shadow of the cloisters in all this exciting music, which is perfectly modern in its free development and display of passion.—Standard.

The work is one in which the Westminster Abbey organist should be proud.—Figaro.

There can be little doubt that his new cantata will ere long become popular in all parts of the country.—Globe.

It ought to take very high rank among the popular cantatas of the modern repertory. In the provinces and among ordinary choral societies there is little doubt that Callirhoe will be in immediate demand, not only because the choral work is so sympathetic and effective, but also because it really needs the engagement of only two artists out of the usual quartet, the contralto having very little, the baritone nothing to do.—Daily News.

Will doubtless find a speedy welcome among choral societies.—Morning Post.

May be strongly recommended to the notice of choral societies as certain to interest them and their audiences.—Athenæum.

THE ARMADA.—Note.—The Spanish Inquisition existed more as a State Tribunal than as an ecclesiastical court, the Crown assuming the right of appointing its chief officers and controlling as well as executing their sentences. So extreme was its rigour, so excessive its penalties, that Pontiff after Pontiff condemned it, Pope Sirtus IV. issuing several Bulls protesting against its merciless severity. When, in 1546, an attempt was made to introduce the Inquisition into Naples, Pope Paul III. not only refused to sanction its establishment there, but exhorted the Neapolitans to resist it by all means in their power. The most ardent and earnest Catholics have consistently repudiated the abhorrent cruelties practised by the Inquisition under the dominion and influence of the Spanish Crown.

MISS HOPE GLENN.

From a Photograph by Messrs. W. & D. Downey, Ebury Street, London S.W.

MISS HOPE GLENN, the popular American contralto, and the subject of our portrait, was born in Iowa, but is of Scotch descent, being a grand daughter of Colonel Glenn. She received her musical education in France, Italy, and England. In Italy she studied under Signor Lamperti, Sen., and with Madame Viardot Garcia in Paris, where she made her operatic debut in "Linda," singing the rôle of Pierrotto, and though her success was considerable, she decided to devote herself to the concert and oratorio stage. After appearing in America for the first time in public only three or four years ago, under Mr. Henry Abbey's management, with Madame Nilsson's concert party, she returned to London and studied with Mr. Shakespeare. Here her public career may be said to have fairly begun, as she was soon heard of as singing at the Crystal Palace, Covent Garden, and at most of the popular concerts in London and the Provinces. She sails this month for America, having been engaged to sing at the Worcester Festival, and at a series of concerts for which her agent, Mr. W. B. Healey, has arranged.

Wednesday, as we briefly stated last week, was occupied in the performance of "Samson," Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria," a portion of the "Creation," and Spohr's cantata, "God, Thou art Great." The orchestration used for "Samson" was that prepared by Mr. Ebenezer Prout, who has done his work, as might be expected, in the true Handelian spirit. To shorten the performance, the whole part of Delilah was cut away, as were also others of the more important choruses and solos. That the rendering was, as a whole, worthy and adequate can hardly be said. Several of the choruses were taken at a rate which largely destroyed their breadth and dignity, a result which must be attributed entirely to incompetent conducting. In justice, however, to Dr. Colborne, the hardship of his position must be recognised. The absurd custom prevailing at these festivals, which compels the Cathedral organist to assume the post of conductor, regardless of his qualifications for the task, forced Dr. Colborne into a duty for which he is not fitted, and in which he deserves the sympathy, rather than the blame, of every musician. With regard to the solos, which were in the hands of such well-tried artists as Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Brereton, and Mr. Santley, there is not much to be said, for with the exception of the first-named lady, all the singers gave excellent interpretations of their parts. Of Madame Albani's rendering of "Let the bright Seraphim," into which she saw fit to introduce a vulgar cadenza, it need only be said that it was quite unworthy of her reputation.

Much better was the performance of "The Woman of Samaria," which followed that of "Samson." The solos were taken by Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Banks, and Mr. Brereton, who, individually and collectively, were excellent. The ensemble in the beautiful unaccompanied quartett, "God is a Spirit" was admirable. This was indeed the most artistic performance of the day. That Miss Anna Williams and Miss Hilda Wilson were earnest and sympathetic need not be said; but explicit praise should be awarded to Mr. Banks and Mr. Brereton, who, although comparatively young artists, have given proof of distinct capacity as oratorio singers.

Very welcome was the performance of a portion of Haydn's Creation, which, given in the Cathedral on Wednesday evening, showed plainly that the resources at Dr. Colborne's command could, on occasion, do excellent work. The performance exhibited a very marked improvement upon the work previously done. Madame Albani, apparently recovered from the artistic aberrations of the morning, sang magnificently, and once more merged the prima donna in the artist. The tenor music was delivered with excellent force and expression by Mr. Banks, and Mr. Santley, who was in good voice, gave his allotted airs with all his old power. It was, however, in the choral numbers that the improvement to which we have referred was chiefly noticeable, while the orchestra, abating a few unaccuracies, was all that could be desired. The evening programme was completed by the performance of Spohr's "God, Thou art Great," in which the solos were given by Miss Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Banks, and Mr. Brereton; and of Schubert's "Song of Miriam," the solo in the latter being allotted to Miss Anna Williams, who apparently on occasions of the sort knows not weariness.

Thursday was to a large extent the most important day of the whole week, for it was marked by the performance of one work which, although not written for the occasion, was to all intents a novelty, since it had not been previously heard in England. This was the "Song of Thanksgiving," composed by Mr. F. H. Cowen for the centennial celebration in Australia. Besides this, which no less on account of its origin than of its immediate purpose, could not fail to be interesting, the Western amateurs were given the opportunity of hearing two other works which are not so familiar as they deserve to be, namely, Cherubini's Mass in D minor, and Sir Frederick Gore Ouseley's "St. Polycarp." That Cherubini's Mass should be so little performed is surely matter for wonder, when we remember that it was written three-quarters of a century ago, for the element of strangeness, apparently so unwelcome to that singular creature, the British Public, might reasonably be supposed to have vanished. However this may be, there can be no question of the importance of the work itself, or of its suitability for festival use. The composer has given the largest share of work to the chorus, leaving the soloists but little to do though that little is extremely beautiful. The choruses are throughout interesting, there being hardly a useless phrase in any part, and the instrumentation singularly rich and effective. The principal singers were Madame Albani, Miss Ambler, Madame Enriquez, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. C. Banks, and Mr. Santley.

In estimating Mr. Cowen's new work, the circumstances of its production should be borne in mind. That "art cannot be forced" was the favourite maxim of Messrs. Cornelius and Humphrey Jagenal, and though in the mouths of those worthies it was but an excuse for incompetence, there is, none the less, a large element of truth in it. How many good attempts have failed in art, apparently for no other reason than that the artist has been fettered by the imposition of conditions alien to his own purposes. In work of this sort "occasional" and "ephemeral" are too often interchangeable terms. These things being so, it becomes a personal duty to congratulate Mr. Cowen on the spontaneity and freshness which marks much of his new work. Certainly he must indeed have been an unimaginative man who failed to find ample source of inspiration in the rejoicings of a great colonial empire, celebrating its hundredth birthday. The words of the ode are taken, appropriately enough, from the Psalms, and the work is divided into three choruses, the second being unaccompanied. The whole composition is a most happy expression of the trustful and grateful feelings which may be fitly supposed to animate those in whose mouths they are placed. The harmonic changes are managed in so skilful a way as to enhance the beauty of the melodic phrases without making them tedious by repetition, or overstrained by needless modulation. The unaccompanied chorus contains some good contrapuntal writing, its close being particularly sweet and effective. The final chorus is, perhaps, the least vigorous and broad, but in a song of thanksgiving, graceful, flowing measures are more suitable than heavy involved writing. The good qualities we have pointed out should commend the work for more than occasional use.

Between Mr. Cowen's "Ode," and Sir F. Ouseley's Oratorio, was introduced Dr. Parry's fine setting of Milton's noble lines "Blest Pair of Syrens." The task of composing music which should be worthy of such a poem is one not be lightly approached, and had Dr. Parry been less successful than was the case, he would have deserved respect for the spirit in which he entered on his work. As it is, he has produced a highly poetic and richly-coloured composition, which, full of his own individuality as it is, breathes much of the true Miltonic spirit. Higher praise than this could not be awarded. Conducted by the composer, who secured an admirable interpretation from chorus and orchestra, the work seemed to produce a deep impression.

As Mr. Cowen's work stands out from the ranks of "occasional" pieces, so does Sir F. Ouseley's oratorio, "St. Polycarp," emerge from the mediocre level of "diploma compositions." The work in question, written about thirty years ago on the occasion of the composer's reception of the degree of Doctor of Music at Oxford, shows but little signs of academic formalism, although it bears its epoch written legibly on every page. To say that it is not a dramatic work would not be true; but still less would it be true to say that it is dramatic, in the sense in which the word is understood to-day. There is much beautiful melodic writing, as, for instance, in the airs, "For none of these things" and "Yet let me pray," the latter of which is inspired with the true Christian spirit. On the other hand the number, "Swear by Cæsar's fortunes" is weaker than its words, the second phrase of eight bars being especially conventional. Far better is the double chorus, "He taught impiety," leading naturally to the powerful octave-climax and finish. Perhaps the most conventional number is the March, which might do duty in any work, sacred or otherwise. But with these exceptions, the oratorio contains much that is beautiful and refined, and its performance on Thursday, under Dr. Colborne's direction, was fairly adequate. The soloists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Ambler, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Mr. Santley, who did full justice to their allotted tasks. A miscellaneous concert was given in the evening of the same day, of which the most interesting feature was a graceful gavotte and minuet for strings, by Mr. C. Lee Williams, the organist of Gloucester Cathedral.

The Festival was concluded on Friday morning with a performance of the "Messiah," which was so far satisfactory that it calls for no detailed criticism. Praise may, however, be awarded to the custom which, at these Festivals, forbids the excision of the duet, "O Death," and the chorus, "But thanks be to God." The soloists were Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Banks, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Brereton.

Regarding the financial results of the Festival, it is pleasant to learn that the receipts have been large, if not quite up to the expectations of the Committee. The total attendance during the four days was 6,630, and the amount to be handed over to the charity is £800, 3s. 5d.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL WORLD."

SIR,—Attention is being directed to a widespread and seemingly well-founded complaint on the part of London professional musicians, who aver that it is the custom on the part of the students at the various academies and colleges to employ their spare time in giving private music lessons on their own account, and it is further asserted that a very large proportion of students of the R.C.M., R.A.M, and G.S.M., are so engaged.

If this be true, a great injustice is being done to established musicians, who having, at more or less expense, qualified themselves for this already over-stocked profession, find themselves confronted by an army of always inexperienced and often conceited young persons who, upon the strength of a few lessons from a well-known master or his assistant, aspire to instruct in all or many of the branches of musical art.

Now, the evil of this practice is twofold; firstly, it injures our art by multiplying the number of incompetent teachers—to say nothing of injuring the receptive faculties of these pupil-teachers, whose thoughts should be centred solely upon their own education in every moment of the working day, all too short as it is in comparison with the length of art. Secondly, it injures the profession by reducing the scale of fees, since these tyros are able to ask terms such as their elders, who are fully fledged taxpaying citizens, are unable to accept; the actual effect of this being to lower the general standard of remuneration to all save a few select specialists who can dictate their own terms. It is said that people who want good teaching will pay good terms, but, in nine cases out of ten, people don't know what good teaching is; and of those who do, how many, alas, in these hard times, feel it incumbent upon themselves to "put the screw on" in the payment for accomplishments.

It is too often sufficient that—"My daughter's master is from the Royal Academy or the Royal College!" or that—"My son learns of a pupil of Herr Long, or Mr. Hirsute:"—the quality of the instruction being taken for granted if the instructor tacks on to his name (often without the slightest warrant the mystic letters "R.C.M.," "R.A.M.," or "G.S.M.!"

Doubtless, young students are hard put to it to provide themselves with "the wherewithal," but it is feared that the majority of the pupil teachers are chiefly influenced by direct personal vanity, or the desire to supplement their pocket money, so as to indulge in many little luxuries which, harmless in themselves, could yet be dispensed with.

I venture to think, sir, that this matter is an important one, and that besides the general public, there are three classes of musicians who are personally interested in it; these are—the profession in general; the directors and staff of the institutions in particular; and the young persons in question. The first named are practically powerless, owing to the deplorable lack of cohesion in our ranks; the third should remember that in lowering the scale of fees they are mortally injuring their own future interest, while I venture to think that the second have a duty to fulfil in protecting the said future of class three, in maintaining the reputation of the institutions over which they preside, and in defending the interests of those outside professionals who have already so hard a task to hold their own against the powerful academic bodies with their established prestige and cheap fees. But that college must suffer whose pupils are permitted to impart to others imperfect instruction at half-price, and its professors suffer also, when their pupils, after a few lessons, retail to others garbled versions of the instruction they themselves have received, often inflicting irreparable injury on the vocal organs. It is precisely because I do not myself suffer in pocket by the practice complained of that, in the interests of some who do, and in the cause of art, I feel justified in asking whether—if the evil be as widespread as I believe it to be—it does not demand the serious attention of us all. With apologies for troubling you at this length, I am, sir,

Yours faithfully, L.

WURTHY SUR,

Last Wensday efterninn I was sittin' at ma faverite wundie, jist tae see an' be seen. Sanders Sanderson, douce man, was at ma elbie. By-an'-by, a likely lad comes up the street. "Wha's that, Sanders?" quo I; "he's no a Fifer, by the look o' um." "Nor yet a drummer," says Sanders, startin' back like shot, "although he's the Hammer o' St. Andrews: it's Greig o' Edinburry!" "Ow," I shrieghed, grabbin' at ma staff, "an' I had 'um here, I'd dig ma ten commandments in the ill-faur'd face o' 'um. But what are ye snuffin' at like a soo that sees the wind?" says I tae Sanders. "Smelt ye brunstane, kimmer?" whispers Sanders, with a face the colour o' a herrin' i' the dark; "mind, it's the deil himsel' that's on oor track;" an' wi' that he banged under the table. I was noo left in fu' possession o' the wundie; an', as the stranger chap was noo richt opposite, I began to take the size o' 'um through ma telescope. Catchin' me i' the act (in ma time I was a prime faverite wi' the lads), oor veesitor verra pulitely lifted his hat an' smiled. Eh! sic an angel's smile it was! It brocht ma hert tae ma mooth at ance. "Sanders, ye gowk," I cried, "come oot here, an' introduce this lad tae me. It's tae coort me that he's come!" "Tae introduce 'um tae you wad be tae mak 'um blessed among weemin," snarls Sanders frae his hidin'-hole. "Tae shave ye wad be wiser like, ye wuzzend wutch!" "Hear me, Sanders," I implored; "gif I canna hae 'um for a lad, I'll hae 'um for a son. He thinks he's a museeshaner: we'll mak' a Mus. Doc. o' 'um. Twa sic sons hae been born tae me in ma auld age; an' aulder men than he they were when they were christened." "But without their wisdum teeth cut!" growls Sanders, sneakin' frae his kennel. "Can ye hae forgot, madam, that I masell offered the degree tae 'um, that he turned an' rent me like buwll o' Bawshan, an' that he ca's the Senate knaves an' ijits for dispensin' sic a title as Mus Doc.?" "Just ae word wi' 'um, Sanders," sabbed I; "hae mercy on yer mither!" "Not a sullabul!" roars Sanders, clutchin' at ma airm, "or I'll pitch ye owre the wundie, like the Jezebul ye are!" "LETTERS UPON THE POETRY AND MUSIC OF THE ITALIAN OPERA."*

This extraordinary swell from all the parts of the orchestra is, in general, practised with great success at the conclusion of such airs, in which, supposing the words even not to be understood, (any further than they can be guessed at from the context, and by the action of the speaker), the effect they are intended to have on the audience is more happily obtained than it could be by the clear articulation of them, unaccompanied by that torrent of passion, if I may so speak, which may be produced by this united exertion of all the instrumental parts. For it must be likewise observed that passion, when very violent, is expressed not so much by the words of the speaker as by other signs, the tones of the voice, the action of the face, and the gesture; insomuch, that I am confident I have heard many airs of this kind, in which, had the actor, without speaking a note, looked and acted his part with propriety, nobody would have been at a loss to judge either of the kind or of the degree of passion by which he seemed actuated. Rousseau, somewhere in his works, makes a very ingenious observation, the truth of which the Italian composers seem evidently to have felt: "That, as violent passion has a tendency to choak the voice, so, in the expression of it by musical sounds, a roulade, which is a regular succession of notes up or down, or both, rapidly pronounced on one vowel, has often a more powerful effect than distinct articulation." Such passages are sometimes introduced in airs of this kind; and, though I cannot help giving my assent to Rousseau's observation, yet I must, at the same time confess, that they are too apt to be abused, and that, if continued for any length of time, they have always appeared to me unnatural. Upon the whole, I hope, however, it must be evident, even to those who are not conversant with music, that, in the expression of the more violent passions, the instrumental parts may have a greater latitude than in other kinds of airs, in which the emotions being more moderate, the expression of them depends proportionally more on the force of the words, and less on the tone and action with which they are accompanied. But, whatever may be the effect of airs of this kind, when properly led by the circumstances of the piece and explained by the character of the speaker, your Lordship must see with what impropriety they are introduced, as is frequently the case, in our concerts, where, without the audience being apprised either of the interest of the piece, or the nature of the characters, they are sung by a fellow standing bolt upright, with one hand in his side, and the other in his breeches-pocket, and where, into the bargain, the unmerciful scrapers of our orchestra, taking the advantage of the fortissimo, which they find now and then written above the notes of their parts, seem to vie with one another, who shall most effectually overpower, throughout, both the voice of the singer, and the melody of the song. It is this kind of ignorant selection, and murderous execution, which give sensible people a distaste to Italian music in general; nor can they surely be blamed for thinking it absurd, that a man should say what cannot, in the nature of things, be heard, and that all that violent fracas and noise of instruments is a most ridiculous accompanyment to the affected immobility and unmeaning simper of the singer.

PROVINCIAL.

MANCHESTER, Sept. 17.

The summer season here has been, as usual, dreary enough from a musical point of view. Occasionally, it is true, a concert or band performance has been given, but these have been of so popular and mediocre a kind as not to require detailed notice. The only event of interest that has occurred has been the the visit of the Russian National Opera Company to the Comedy Theatre. This afforded an opportunity of making a brief acquaintance with a class of music of which but little has hitherto penetrated so far West as England, and which is yet so stamped with a national individuality as to be thereby invested with an extreme interest quite apart from the question of its value as determined by the canons of music. To the latter it is, however, that the final appeal must be made whereby the position of Russian opera in the world of music is decided, and when that appeal is made, we cannot but think that much will be found in works like Rubinstein's Demon and Glinka's Life for the Czar which will entitle them to permanent recognition. The performances were on the whole creditable; and both the acting and singing of the two chief baritones, MM. Tarlakow and Winogradoff were more than creditable. Of baritones and basses indeed there was no lack—but we were not so fortunate as to hear anyone who could justly claim to be the possessor of a tenor voice. The precision of the choruses was admirable; but two often the members were zealous rather than artistic. Possibly, however, the smallness of the theatre may have been partly responsible for the unsoftened vigour that issued to pervade the performances.

From so uneventful a summer it is a relief to turn our eyes to the compensatory attractions of the oncoming winter. Of these the foremost is undoubtedly the series of twenty concerts given by Sir Charles Hallé. The season commences as usual on the last Thursday in October, and to this date most of the Manchester musicians are no doubt looking forward with keen anticipation. The first appearance of Sir Charles is always the signal for an ovation. This year it will be doubly so, for since he was last amongst us, honours have fallen thickly upon him. All who know anything of contemporary musical life, must have felt that his knighthood came to him not undeserving; but how entirely he has earned it can only be fully appreciated by us in Manchester, for whom he has unweariedly laboured, so that we might come to know and to love what is beautiful in music. His marriage with Madame Norman Neruda was hardly a surprise, and is surely altogether in the fitness of things. Recalling the many times we have heard them play together, we can only hope that the perfect sympathy and mutual comprehension which marked them on these occasions may accompany them into domestic life. Existence for them can hardly fail to be a most delightful duet. As to the arrangements for Sir Charles's next series of concerts, little can as yet be definitely stated, but we have good authority for saying that the programmes of six choral concerts have been for the most part already decided. "The Messiah" will, of course, be given at Christmas time; and "Elijah," Berloiz's "Faust," and Rubinstein's "Paradise Lost" will also be performed. It is not improbable that we may have an opportunity of hearing Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon," and finally, Handel's "Hercules" is to be given, if only the parts of that rarely yerformed work can all be got together—if not, its place will be taken by Verdi's "Requiem" and same short miscellaneous matter. Later on it may be possible to say something of the remaining fourteen concerts, but at present nothing is settled. In addition to the series given by Sir Charles Hallé there is also that of the Gentlemen's Subscription Concerts. These too are chiefly devoted to the higher kind of music called "classical," and, while not attaining the excellence of those we have just been considering, are still admirable in many ways. They possess two important and distinctive features. One of these is that during the season a few chamber concerts are given in which the best artists always take part; the other, that a series of nine afternoon pianoforte recitals is given by Sir Charles Hallé. In both these matters the Gentlemen's Concerts are to be highly commended, as they do something towards supplying a very definite want. Indeed, the paucity of chamber music here is nothing less than disgraceful in a city of such musical pretensions as Manchester. Of a more popular kind are the concerts given by Mr. de Jong. These, while professedly appealing chiefly to the masses, are still excellent in their way, and fully deserve the patronage extended to them. Various other series might be cited, but these are undoubtedly the most important, and present in themselves attractions enough to make us long for the approach of winter.

BIRMINGHAM, Sept. 17.

The Russian Opera Company terminated its engagement here at the New Grand Theatre on Saturday with Rubinstein's Demon. This return visit unfortunately proved a failure as far as the attendance is concerned. Their artistic success cannot be denied, and with better management they ought to retrieve their heavy losses. Messrs, Harrison have this week issued a complete scheme of their four grand concerts, the first of which will be given on October 15, and at which will appear the following artists: Madame Valleria, Madlle. Antoinette Trebelli, Madlle. Marie de Lido, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. Barrington Foote, solo pianoforte Monsieur Vladimir de Pachmann, solo violin Miss Nettie Carpenter and Miss Geraldine Morgan, solo violoncello Mons. De Munck. Conductor Herr Alois Volkmer. Mr. Stockley's four Orchestral concerts promise this year to be of special excellence. Dr. Hubert Parry has promised to conduct his Orchestral Suite, and Mr. Stockley hopes that Herr Grieg and Mr. Goring Thomas will also appear and conduct some important works of their own. The principal artists already engaged for the series are Madame Nordica, Mdlle. Antoinette Trebelli, Miss Fanny Moody (Carl Rosa Opera Company) Madame Belle Cole (her first appearance here), Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Banks, Mr. Grice, Mr. Chas. Manners, and Mr. Carrodus. Mr. Augustus Harris also announces a short season of Italian opera, commencing on November 26. The list of artists includes many popular and well-known names and is composed chiefly of members of his late company at Covent Garden. Among those are: Mesdames Ella Russell, Macintyre, Trebelli, Rolla, Ponti, and Baueremister, Signori Ravelli. Runcio, De Anna, D'Andrade, Abramoff, Ciampi, Vaschetti, and Miranda, with Signor Arditi as conductor.

A MATTER OF VITAL INTEREST.

From the London Sunday Times.

A few weeks ago we published an article giving some wonderful and astonishing experiences of numerous persons. In the article referred to, such wonderful cases were mentioned and verified by a gentleman connected with this paper on his own experience and that of other well-known persons—that it would seem impossible for anything more remarkable to be brought forward, but the evidence continues to accumulate.

The following is perhaps the most remarkable proof of the wonderful powers of this astonishing remedy:—Henry Coates, of 11, Cheatham-place, Adelaide-street, Hull, railway employé, who had been a terrible sufferer for many years from rheumatism in its worst forms, having had the before-mentioned article read to him, determined upon a trial, which has been attended with the most extraordinary results. On July 17th he appeared before Mr. E. Singleton, a Commissioner to Administer Oaths in the Supreme Court of Judicature in England, and made oath as follows:—He affirmed that he had been unable to work for a long time, and had been confined to his bed for a considerable period; that he had tried various doctors and many remedies, but that he grew worse instead of better; that at that time his joints were so swollen that he could not wear boots, and two crutches were hardly sufficient to support him. After having heard of St. Jacob's Oil, in the manner before stated, he purchased a bottle. In twelve hours he found relief, and, persevering in its use, he is now cured of his rheumatism, works daily, and can not only walk with ease without a stick, but can run; he enthusiastically recommends this great remedy to those suffering from any form of rheumatism, as it has not only done wonders for him but many of his friends. One of the oldest chemists in Hull, Mr. T. W. Robinson, in commenting on this marvellous cure, writes that this is only one of many similar cases that have come to his notice. A. E. Painter, the famous jumper of the London Athletic Club, writes that he strained and bruised his ankle in jumping hurdles so as to disable himself. He used St. Jacob's Oil with the most marvellous results. E. J. Wade, of the same club and Ranelagh Club, sprained his leg and cured it in the same way. He says that athletes should never be without a bottle. Mr. H. J. Masters, a leading chemist, of 12, Argyle street, Bath, writes that it is particularly adapted for the cure of muscular rheumatism and sprains of long standing, and that one of the leading physicians of Bath highly recommends it to his patients. We find also that a nnmber of infirmaries, homes, and hospitals are already familiar with its merits, and are using it with great success. Henry and Ann Bright, hon. superintendents of the North London Home for Aged Christian Blind Women, say that it has proved itself unfailing in its results, that attacks of rheumatism, neuralgia, and other pains and aches have in every case been removed, and that many old ladies, some ninety years of age, instead of tossing about in agony, have been relieved, and had many good nights' rest through its wonderful influence. Mrs. Bright says that she can scarcely say enough in its favour.

We have given the details as above, as we think it well that full publicity should be extended to a matter of such particular interest to all. On calling upon the proprietors, The Charles A. Vogeler Company, 45, Farringdon-road, London, our representative was shown a mass of testimonials of the same nature as above from all parts of the United Kingdom, and from France, Germany, and other countries.

Deaths.

Sept. 6.—Michel Joseph, a Belgian composer of some comic operas and other small compositions for piano, &c. M. Michel was director of Académie de Musique, at Ostend, where he is said to have done good service. He was born at Liege, 12 Dec. 1847

The Organ World.

MR. GRIFFITH ON CHURCH MUSIC.

MR. EDWARD GRIFFITH, in his series of articles on "Reform in Church Music," now appearing in Church Bells, proceeds with his task. He observes:—

> "I must now enter upon the vexed question of Intoning; presuming that in most churches monotone is the rule, whether on a high or low note. If I make the assertion that not five per cent of our clergy can comfortably intone on G. there will, probably, be many dissentients to it; but I believe I am right in my calculation. Is it not painful to hear the unnatural straining of voice in the often ill-advised attempts of clergymen to intone on A or G? And why? Only because the organist thinks the choir harmonies go better when set high, and cares not for priest or congregation."

It is unnecessary to rebuke Mr. Griffith for his rash assertion that organists care "not for priest or congregation"; "those who are in the camp of the enemy must needs speak against their own country," and upon this principle Mr. Griffith, who feels he is fighting for "priest and congregation," may perhaps not unnaturally think it expedient to abuse artistic church musicians, under the mistake that they must be arrayed against rather than needful to the inartistic and ignorant; a mistake only likely to be made by those who are either short-sighted or conscious of being pledged to a weak cause greatly in need of defence. The question of intoning on a low sound is often raised by non-professional quidnuncs who dabble in the business of the church musician; and it is to be regretted that so practical a musician as Mr. E. Griffith should have again brought this weak talk to the front. It should be remembered that the recitation of the Confession, on E say, is very liable to unhappily affect the general tonality of a service afterwards to be monotoned on G. Again, so low a pitch is unfavourable in the case of most voices to the distinct articulation of the words; then no clergyman who takes the trouble to learn how to sing has any difficulty in monotoning in solemn and earnest tones on G. Mr. Griffith goes on to say:—

> "The Bishop of Wakefield, in his valuable Notes on the Church Service, says: 'It is a great and serious mistake to intone on so high a note as G, and whatever it may be for the choir, it is too high for the congregation; and I believe our services would be much improved in reverence and helpfulness to devotion, as well as being more congregational, if a lower note were adopted as the note of the service' From careful observation I find that E is the note upon which mixed bodies of voices will recite with ease. This was demonstrated in a remarkable manner at the Church Congress held at Wakefield, when, asked by the Bishop of Ripon to recite the Apostles' Creed, the vast audience of over 3000 persons naturally fell upon and maintained the note E to the final Amen. This was a delight to me, being a convincing proof of the practicability of responding on E in the musical illustrations I had prepared for my Congress paper on the following evening."

Now it so happened that certain cathedral clergymen and organists, who know something of intoning as Mr. Griffith will be one of the first to admit, were not satisfied with the weak, and one may say, without disrespect, mumbling recitation which gave delight to that gentlemen. Mr. Griffith is on safer ground when he ceases to talk about low reciting notes and sensibly observes:—

> "As the monotone is the only possible voice in which a number of people can recite together and send up their petitions with a unity of voice and heart to 'the throne of the heavenly grace,' it behoves all clergy to select that note which their congregations can take easily and naturally, and to ensure the 'one voice,' without confusion and jumble: for is not God a God of order, and not of confusion?"

The mention of the Bishop of Wakefield as an authority will not add strength to Mr. Griffith's position, remembering that that esteemed Prelate, in spite of many shrewd and earnest words, was not particularly judicious in all he said about Church music, and now and again was so heated and misguided as to speak with not only feeble amateurish utterance but with unjustifiable acrimony regarding our Church musicians and their work. It is unnecessary to follow Mr. Griffith in his condemnation of a harmonised confession; though his words "the tra-la-la rendering" calls for a reminder that Mr. Griffith and his confession on low E or C sharp friends have no monopoly of the virtue of humility, that thousands of hearts are weekly touched by the harmonised confession whatever its faults may be, and serious men care not for trifling comparisons in the discussion of serious subjects. Mr. Griffith goes on thus:—

> "I will add that, in my arrangement of the whole of the Preces and Responses on E for the clergy and people, I find a devotional effect produced by reciting the confession and the Lord's Prayer on the low note C sharp. The illustration of this by the very large audience at the Church Congress was afterwards described to me as 'peculiarly solemn,' and giving an 'expressiveness not heard before.'"

The present writer, willingly conceding that every man is entitled to his own judgment, is thankful he does not attend a Church at which Mr. Griffith's doubtless well-meant ideas prevail. He ventures to ask, is there not a sickly flavour of "canting sentimentality" in this prolonged talk about low pitched devotion and humility? Does not this talk, indeed, conceal a desire to secure a somewhat unwholesome, as sentimental, form of effect, which is a contradiction of the really reverential and dignified method of our great masters of Church song, whose earnestness was tempered by "comely moderation," and who by that very moderation avoided much of the danger of setting up too great a show of religious appearances. Mr. Griffith quotes the Bishop of Wakefield with better result, as follows:—

> "I pass on to the Versicles and Responses; and again I quote Bishop How on a point which I have often wished the clergy to consider. He says, 'Does it always sound as if we were disposing ourselves to psalmody and praise, when the reader (or reciter) in a choral service drops in D or C as he strikes the first tone of praise in the words, "O Lord, upon Thou our lips?"' I think we shall all agree with the Bishop here, and would desire that this versicle should be taken on the note of the following response."

Less satisfactory are the following words:—

> "We must look the fact in the face, that there is no hearty responding in our churches, and that big choirs and big organs have silenced the people effectually. The exigencies of harmony in the choir are considered of much greater importance than the full, bold unison of the multitude in nave and aisles. Even the time-honoured Tallis has had the plain song of the people concealed in the middle of the harmony."

The first sentence is not logical, because we all know that the people cannot and will not sing without the leading of either choir or organ, or both. Artistically the harmony of the choir is of greater importance than the unison—not often either full or bold, Mr. Griffith, or your well-meant discourse would be little needed. What is wanted as every one knows is both the harmony of the choir and the unison of the people, and neither should be disparaged in the interests of the other; but one forgets Mr. Griffith's sympathies are not with the choir but only with the "priest and congregation." This is shown in the succeeding words, which are unsatisfactory as not giving the whole truth, and as laying all the blame on the choir:—

> "Do we ever recognise in our churches the outpouring of thankful hearts? No; and I cannot conscientiously lay the fault or omission to the people. I attribute all to the injudicious high settings, for no other reason than to show off a balanced choir."

Though the following words reveal the cloven foot of Mr. Griffith's own panacea for Church responsive music, they have a healthy ring in them, pleasant and invigorating to listen to :—

> "There is no objection to the harmonising of responses by the choir; and I have shown that this is practicable and effective by arranging the whole prayer-book responses in E. Trust the people, but give them what they can do, and they will have new and joyful sensations in doing it. If the responses are heartily rendered, depend upon it they will boldly attack simple chanting. But in all first attempts with congregations it will be advisable to keep to the unison, even by the whole choir, and somewhat boldly accompanied on the organ. If a few strong and fearless voices can be induced to aid these first efforts by sitting in different parts of the church, the desired end will speedily be attained; the melancholy monotony which frequently characterises our services,—born of the Church's neglect to use her varied powers,—will give place to the hearty, full, and united voice of the congregation, thereby giving the true interpretation of our noble and beautiful Liturgy."

One must turn back to notice that curious expression: "Even the time-honoured Tallis has had the plain song of the people concealed in the middle of the harmony, it is unnecessary surely to remind Mr. Griffith that in accordance with the manner of the age, indicated by the very word "tenor," the canto was placed in that part. There was no intentional concealment in this, and no attempt to put the plain song uppermost in these responses, as written by or ascribed to Tallis, has been made without taking out of them something of their exaltation and expressive power. More will probably have to be said another week concerning Mr. Griffith's words. In the meantime, one rejoices to find so practical and esteemed a Church musician and organist so earnestly interested in and so devotedly labouring for the good cause of Church music.

ORGANS, OLD AND NEW.

A provincial journal some time ago observed, that: "Commendation was due to those who endeavoured to check the existing rage for removing church organs from their ancient sites to very subordinate positions in the sacred edifice. Time will show who has erred, and then the protest can be pointed to with some degree of triumph. In the meantime, the mischief will go on. The parties who promote the desecrations (for what they do is desecration), are generally characterised by stupidity, ignorance, and superciliousness; and these are personal features which nothing can disturb or shame. To our mind, nothing is so discouraging in connection with church music, as to see the organ placed in what are called 'organ chapels,' a modern term in architectural nomenclature, and one which, we trust, will only have a temporary recognition. A private gentleman may have munificently borne the entire cost of a new church, organ included. Such a gentleman, in his own heart would, perhaps, have preferred placing the organ in a commanding and legitimate position, where its tones would have proper effect, but he has given way to the architect's crotchets in favour of the modern organ chapel. In such situations, an organ of small dimensions and cost is sufficient; all the additional cost of a large and elaborate instrument is simply thrown away. However it is no use repeating arguments on the question; the mischief must be allowed to work its own cure. • Musical journals have done what they can in the matter, and they have been supported in their efforts by architectural journals.

As to the restoration of organs, all true lovers of art, and those who understand the mechanism and complicated nature of the instrument, will at once admit that the subject is of great importance. When we hear that any particular organ is about to undergo the process of restoration, we, of course, assume that originally the instrument has been a good one; the work of some experienced builder, whose high class work it is desirable to rescue from the effects of incompetent hands. Many excellent builders flourished in the last century: they were chiefly resident in London, and that city has, we believe, ever since been able to boast of organ-builders competent to preserve the purity of the work of their predecessors, and also to produce specimens of equally sound workmanship whenever they chose to do so; but we question whether organ-builders of the present century have ever possessed that art love of their profession which was the pride of their predecessors. The genuine excellence of the work of the old builders was due to their thorough scientific acquaintance with the subject, and the opportunities they enjoyed for thoughtful application.

In these days of excitement and hurry, a good deal of what is superficial has crept in amongst organ-builders, and the truly artistic workmen is more rare than formerly. Hence, then, how important is the subject of "organ restorations." Were the term rebuild simply used, it might pass unchallenged. In all that pertains to mechanism and detail in an organ, we are now far, very far, in advance of former times, but as to purity of tone we cannot say so much. In running after orchestral effects, we have almost lost sight of the genuine diapason tone, notwithstanding that we hear so much about "voicing on the German principle." We want more of those workmen whom Jemmerthal, a German writer, describes as "clever-thinking organ-builders of the first rank;" but such men are almost forced out of existence, by the nature of the times in which we live and the increasing competition. It is a great pity that this competition should be allowed to vegetate in art subjects; but it cannot be helped. One would not care to inquire into the results of what are called organ restorations; all we wish to express is, a desire that such work be always carried out under careful supervision, and with a proper guard against the influence or interference of incompetent persons. When restoration is determined upon, the work should be delegated to some competent person or persons to be held responsible for its satisfactory execution.

London used to be the great centre of organ-builders, and it is so at present; but within the past few years, the art has spread very much in the provinces, where, in some towns, there are organ factories turning out quite as many, if not more, organs than the great London firms. Many of these instruments, too, are of very superior workmanship, especially in mechanism, and in variety of stops; but, as we have before observed, there is scope for the thinking organ-builder, and now is the time for the exercise of his abilities. The fever for monstre organs has reached its climax; it has outgrown itself; and the educated musician will discard it for the more limited instrument, possessing the genuine quality of tone.

The present desire for the orchestral instrument proper in sacred music, seems to pronounce an adverse verdict upon its representative on the sound-board of an organ, and glad are we for a sign that the organ will be confined to its proper sphere of usefulness, where its sustaining power can be appreciated, and its majesty in appropriate music be heard to advantage.

It may be questioned whether the "fever for monstre organ" was abated, seeing the specifications which go to show these giants are rearing their heads, or rather their pipes, in all civilised parts of the world. Certain it is however, that thinking organists, headed by some of the most distinguished representatives of the organ-playing art of to-day, are crying out for a reaction against the constant demand for heavy wind pressure. It must be remembered that much rebuilding of organs has arisen from the increased study of classical organ music, demanding complete pedal-boards, etc. Even tone-colour and picturesque effect are powers, which if originally orchestral are now permanently adopted by organ composers and players. Still greater respected for sedate, diapason tone is in truth wanted; even though the development of the instrument may be allowed to proceed more or less upon present lines.

REVIEWS.

"Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis," H. Walmsley Little, Mus. Doc., F.C.O. (Novello and Co.). An Evening Service at once adapted for ordinary and festival use, and scored for the orchestra. The Magnificat consists of dignified and well-contrasted choral movements, with graceful, tender passages for soprano, with piano sentences for the choir. A vigorous Gloria, with a point of imitation on a dominant pedal, completes the canticle. The Nunc Dimittis is announced by a bass passage of tuneful character, the music being then taken up in soft harmony by the chorus with good effect. The same effective Gloria rounds off the setting, and gives completeness to the whole Service. Though of moderate length, the music is written with such purpose and judgment as to remove all feeling of compression, so common in English church music.—"Te Deum," F. A. W. Docker (Novello and Co.). Another effective piece of Service music in G, the key of Dr. Little's Service just noticed. This piece is in triple measure, and it abounds in simple, dignified sentences; as the simple setting of the "Sanctus" in plain chords, with a repeated figure for organ pedals, an unassuming but quite striking passage. For daily Cathedral use and for parochial choirs this setting is admirably adapted.—"Concluding Evening Hymn" and "Triune Amen," F. W. Blacow, A.C.O. (Novello and Co.). Simple vocal harmonies of an expressive character, which reflect credit upon the taste and feeling of the composer.—"Arrangements for the Organ," W. J. Westbrook, Mus. Doc. (The London Publishing Co.). Nos. 15 and 16 of these musicianly arrangements, by the able and industrious transcriber, are of special interest to organists, consisting as they do of the movements of an organ concerto by no less a master than Samuel Wesley. A note is that "this Concerto was frequently performed by its composer, and the names of the violinists who led his band are met with interest at the present day. Written upon the principal violin part may be seen:—'Jan. 30, 1810, Mr. Ashley; March 12, 1810, Mr. F. Cramer; July 6, 1813, Dr. Hayne; March 4, 1825, Mr. Mori; May 5, 1826, Mr. Cramer.' As here given, the Concerto follows the original manuscript, but in performance Wesley was accustomed to introduce the well-known fugue with the demisemiquaver subject from Bach's "48," (in D the key of the Concerto), first as an organ solo, then by the strings of the band." It may here be added, that Mendelssohn is said to have played this same clavier fugue with effect on the organ. Wesley's Concerto begins with a spirited and varied movement in triple measure, containing fine and brilliant passages. The second movement is a beautiful "Larghetto Cantabile" in A major and minor, full of charming tune and effective part-writing. An "Allegro Moderato" in D, the key of the work, completes the piece. This is a fine, clear, vigorous piece of writing, showing throughout the master hand. Organists will be grateful to Dr. Westbrook for this valuable and interesting revival.

"The Organists' Quarterly Journal," Part 79, Vol. 10. Edited by Dr. W. Spark (Novello and Co.) This present issue leads off with a "Fugue in G," completing an Organ Sonata by Mr. E. Townsend Driffield, a clearly written and spirited piece. Next comes an "Easy Postlude in D," by H. R. Jackson, of a simple but on the whole effective character. A musicianly "Introductory Voluntary" in A, by Dr. J. H. Gower, with episodical choral passages, will interest organists. A simple "Prayer," in E flat, by J. R. Crapper; and a "Postlude" in G, written minuet fashion, with a vigorous Coda by the Editor, complete the contents of the number.

PROFESSIONAL v. AMATEUR ORGANISTS.

An organist writes in the course of a letter to the editor of a Contemporary:—

It is with much interest that I read, on this side of the Atlantic, the correspondence anent the pilfering of organist appointments by the amateur. Compare this city of Montreal, Canada, of 200,000 inhabitants, with any other city of like importance, and I venture to assert that, in so far as concerns the amateur predominance appertaining to musical matters, this place undoubtedly takes the palm. Let me quote from a memo taken some twelve months ago, with regard to the amateur organist:—

Christ Church Cathedral.—Organist, a Bank Clerk; stipend, 800 dols., equivalent to £160 sterling.

St. George's Church.—Organist, a Cotton Merchant; stipend, 800 dols., equivalent to £160 sterling.

Holy Trinity Church.—Organist, a Clerk in a Wholesale Watchmaker's Establishment; stipend, 400 dols., equivalent to £80 sterling.

St. Martin's Church.—Organist, a Bank Clerk; stipend, 600 dols., equivalent to £120 sterling.

Grace Church.—Organist, a Clerk in the Offices of the Grand Trunk Railway; stipend, 200 dols, equivalent to £40 sterling.

St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church.—Organist, a Corn Merchant; stipend for self and choir, 2,000 dols., equivalent to £400 sterling.

American Presbyterian Church.—Organist, Clerk in Corn Merchant's office (son of the above); stipend, 700 dols., equivalent to £140 sterling.

Erskine Presbyterian Church.—Organist, a Solicitor; stipend, 600 dols., equivalent to £120 sterling.

Dominion Methodist Church.—Organist, a Wholesale Boot and Shoe Manufacturer; stipend, 600 dols., equivalent to £120 sterling.

Emmanuel Church.—Organist, a Solicitor; stipend, 200 dols., equivalent to £40 sterling.

I do not wish to say anything for or against the musical ability of these several gentlemen, but I do say that wealthy merchants, who have much and to spare of this world's goods, should in all decency content themselves with their own business sphere in life, and should refrain from robbing the hard-working musician in this barefaced manner of the means gaining his livelihood.

Pray do not infer, by these remarks, that there is a dearth of professional men here, for such is by no means the case; but so long as the amateur is allowed to usurp the place of the thoroughly qualified organist, the latter must, as a natural consequence, suffer.

RECITAL NEWS.

BOLTON.—The attractive weekly recitals at the Town Hall were resumed on September 1, by Mr. W. Mullineux, F.C.O. Programme: March for the Organ in B flat, Silas; Berceuse in A, Delbruck; Pizzicato from Orchestral Suite, Sylvia, Délibes; Bridal March, Lohengrin, Wagner; Rondo from a Piano Sonata, Haydn; Selection from Mikado, Sullivan; Overture William Tell, Rossini.

PARISH CHURCH OF FOLKESTONE.—An Organ Recital was given by Mr. Alfred Oake, L.R.A.M., A.C.O., on September 5. Programme: Con Spirito in D, Smart; Impromptu in E, Hatton; Fugue in G minor (Organ Concerto), Handel; Introduction, Theme, Variations, and Finale, Hesse; Rondo di Campanelli (by desire), Morandi; Solo, "When Thou tookest upon Thee" (Dettingen Te Deum), Rev. H. A. Wandsbrough, M.A.; Cavatina, Raff; Aria "O rest in the Lord" Elijah, Mendelssohn; Festive March, Smart.

GODALMING PARISH CHURCH.—Organ Recital given on September 9, by Mr. F. de G. English, B.A., F.C.O. Programme: Overture to Occasional Oratorio, Handel; Carillons de Dunkerque, T. Carter; Concerto in G minor, Corelli; Prelude and Fugue in C major, J. S. Bach; Pastorale (Sonata I.), Guilmant; Introduction and Theme with Variations, Hesse; Largo in D (Sonata II.), Beethoven; Andante, No. 1, in G, Smart; Postlude in D, Smart.

LIVERPOOL.—Recitals were given by Mr. W. T. Best at St. George's Hall, on September 1, 6, and 8.—Guilmant's Offertoire in G major; Mendelssohn's Andante from the Fourth Symphony; Handel's Organ Concerto in F major; Gambini's Adagio Religioso; Best's March, "La Garde passe;" Adam's Overture, "La Reine d'un Jour."—Mendelssohn's Overture, "Son and Stranger;" Saint-Saens's Andante Religioso in E major; Hesse's Fantasia in C minor, Op. 35; Mozart's Air, "Voi che sapete;" Hatton's Scherzo, from the music to "A Winter's Tale."—Guilmant's March in D major; Smart's Fantasia with Chorale; Haydn's Andante in D major, from the Sixth Quartet; Bach's Prelude and Fugue in F major; Handel's Allegretto, from the Violin Sonata in A major; Gounod's Funeral March of a Marionnette; Cagnoni's Overture, "Francesca di Rimini."

NEW CHURCH, PEEL.—A festival service and organ recital took place on September 12. The organ recital was given by Miss McKnight, F.R.O., Organist of the Parish Church, Alfreton, Derbyshire. Programme: Offertoire. Dawre; Anthem, "O Give Thanks" Goss; Flute Concerto, Rink; Quartette, "God is a Spirit" (Woman of Samaria), W. S. Bennett; Prelude and Fugue, G. minor, Bach; Solo, "O rest in the Lord" (Elijah), Mendelssohn; Andante, Allegretto, Allegro, "4th Sonata," Mendelssohn; Anthem, "Come unto Him," Gounod; Fautasia (Storm), Lemmens; Solo, "He was despised" (Messiah) Handel; Toccata, Hatton; Duet, "Now we are Ambassadors" (St. Paul), Mendelssohn; Chorus, "How lovely are the Messengers"; Bell Rondo, Morandi; Anthem' "They that do down to the Sea in Ships" Attwood; Concerto in F, Handel.

CHURCH OF ST. NICHOLAS COLE-ABBEY.—An Organ Recital was given on September 11, by Mr. Geo. Shinn, Mus. Bac. Cantab. (Organist and Choirmaster, Christ Church, Gipsy Hill.) Vocalist, Miss Leah Marchant. Programme: Fantasia, Rink; Andante in E minor, Batiste; Solo, "O rest in the Lord," Mendelssohn; Fac ut Portem, Rossini; Prelude and Fugue in C minor, Bach; Romance in A flat, Mozart; Solo, "Eternal Rest," Piccolomini; Grand Offertoire in C. minor, Wely.

That excellent New York paper The Churchman has the following:—

> The opening of a new organ in Christ Church, Poughkeepsie, excites lively comment in the local press. The instrument displaced was exceptionally effective and satisfactory, both in contrasts afforded by its composition and admirable voicing. It was just in its prime, and by sufficient additions by the builder, Jardine, would, apparently, have better suited the needs of the congregation than its somewhat more pretentious successor. It has three manuals. The great organ contains ten stops, with a double open diapason, 16 ft.; a swell organ, eleven stops, with a bourdon, 16 ft., for its foundation; a choir organ of six stops; and a pedal organ of three stops. The remaining seventeen registers are for mechanical arrangements. The organ therefore consists of thirty speaking stops. There are four 16 ft. stops. The maker's name is not mentioned. The opening was under the direction of Prof. Berge, who was assisted by several vocal soloists of some distinction in New York. The excellent chorus choir of St. Paul's, however, seemed to have contributed the Churchly element to the programme which presented the rather generous array of sixteen numbers. Organs have ways of behaving badly on "first nights," and it is to be hoped that it will in good time satisfy the generous parish. There are many indications of prosperity in our correspondence from Tottenville, Staten Island. St. Stephen's parish, recently incorporated, is under the rectorship of the Rev. C. W. de Lyon Nichols. A Sunday afternoon choral services, much in the spirit of similar services at St. Chrysostom, St. James and others, as usual practically vindicates the value of such efforts. This service proves a great devotional attraction to the entire region, many attending from neighbouring towns, in New Jersey as well as on the island. An interesting feature is that so far as practicable, each afternoon is devoted to a single great composer, with a brief address upon the life, genius, and spirit of his works. Owing to the summer residence of several accomplished artists from the city, the solos from Gounod, Handel, Mendelssohn, and others are delivered with the utmost impressiveness. There is fortunately an excellent organist in the person of Miss Golder of Rossville, of an old Church family, who have made valuable gifts, as a handsome altar-cross with vases.

Two recent organ recitals given at Peel, Isle of Man, by Miss McKnight, F.C.O., have given much satisfaction, and the lady's playing is highly spoken of by the local press. Miss McKnight is organist at Alfreton, Derbyshire. Organ Recitals it may be added, are not novelties at the Peel Church; Miss O. L. Wood, A.C.O., who has done much good work in the island in the cause of music, has, during her service as Organist there, created a love of organ music by her own excellent recitals.

Professor Ratzenberger, voluntary organist at the German Church at Vevey, and well known as the conductor of concerts given on behalf of charitable undertakings, has composed a Funeral March in memory of the late Emperors William and Frederick of Germany, the proceeds from the sale of which are to be given to the "Deutscher Hülfsverein" of Switzerland. A copy of the March having been presented to Pope Leo XIII., Professor Ratzenberger received the following letter from Cardinal Kampello:—

> I have pleasure in informing you that your letter and composition have been presented to, and accepted by, His Holiness, who was much gratified by your kind congratulations on the occasion of his Jubilee, and, in token of his heartfelt thanks, gives you the Apostolic blessing.

NOTES.

In speaking of the "High Church Movement," Bishop Barry, of Sydney, observes:—"Next, in relation to Christian worship. The excessive predominance of preaching gave way to a stronger assertion of the sacredness of worship which, as usual, manifested itself visibly in all the arrangements of our churches. The High Church School, caring more than its predecessor both for antiquity and for culture, sought to invest the worship of the Church with greater solemnity and beauty. The new or restored churches, which soon covered the land, the revival of Gothic Church architecture, the cultivation of more artistic Church music, the greater attention to ceremony and ritual, the more intelligent study of the origin, history, principles of our Liturgy—all these were simply the signs and results of this leading principle. In the days of which I now speak it had not dreamt of many of its later ritual developments. I can remember, too, that then it was more careful for dignity and reverence than for fervour and popularity. Stern Gregorianism or other simplicity in chants; in hymns (as the old edition of Hymns Ancient and Modern clearly shows) a more antique severity and graver plainness; in sermons a shrinking from extemporary utterance and fervour of delivery—all these belonged to its earlier stages, which have now passed away. But here also the movement has told, and told on the whole for good, on every section—I had almost said every passage—I had almost said every parish—of the Church of England." To this my be added, the increasing love and knowledge of music must also be credited with accelerating to a large extent the growth of Church music in our midst. This is clearly proved by the fact that not only have we more and better service music, but that musical sermon, the oratorio, has of late been restored to its original home, the Church, and the organ recital has become a largely recognised institution; and again, the orchestra has been, with the oratorio and sacred cantata, again brought into the service of religion, to an extent which a few years ago could not have been anticipated.

A blind organist of Vienna, Herr Tabor, who is a protégé of the Princess Frederica of Hanover, is expected in London, to give a series of concerts.

Mr. W. H. Gator, Mus. Doc., Organist of St. Stephen's, Dublin, was the succesful competitor at the Welsh National Eisteddfod for a prize given for the best original hymn tune. The prize was awarded for a tune to Bishop Heber's hymn, "From Greenland's icy mountains." There were ninety-seven competitors; the judges were E. Prout, B.A., and A. J. Caldicott, Muc. Bac,

The Rev. Francon Davies, B.A., formerly a curate in Bangor diocese, was the preacher at the Welsh service at Bangor Cathedral on a recent Sunday. The anthem was, "It is high time" (Elijah), the solo being rendered by the reverend gentleman, who is a well-known musical amateur, and is, says the Liverpool Mercury, understood to be studying for the oratorio platform. He based his sermon upon the character of Elijah.

The Rev. A. Wellesley Batson, Mus. Bac. Oxon., precentor of St. Anne's, Soho, has been appointed to the living of Great Ringstead, King's Lynn, Norfolk, void by the resignation of the Rev. W. L. Hussey. The living, which is in the gift of Mr. H. Le Strange, Hunstanton Hall, is a valuable one.

The neglect of church music in the scheme of the Church Congress at Manchester, excites comment, as it may be said to do annually. It is disappointing indeed, to note the little attention devoted at these meetings to the improvement and advancement of the services of the church and ecclesiastical art.

Probably during no preceding summer has the organ recital, beeg recognised so extensively as an institution, as has been the case this season. The popularity of the organ recital has naturally been specially noticeable at our sea-side and other pleasure places. There are signs, too, of an increase in the number of organ performances during the coming winter season.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS' CALENDAR.

Concerts.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The honours of the evening were carried off on Wednesday by the vocalists—an unusual feature at these concerts. The classical element was indeed conspicuous by its almost total absence, the Melusine overture and two movements of the Violin Concerto of Mendelssohn being, strictly speaking, the only pieces deserving of the title. The first of these was rather tamely played, but in the Concerto Mr. Bernard Carrodus gave promise of much future excellence. This is not to say that promise only was apparent, for his technique is of a high order; but that individuality which only comes with ripened powers, was almost entirely lacking. We regret that we are unable to speak more favourably of Mr. H. M. Higgs' Suite, than to praise a certain dexterity of orchestral handling. The Italian suite of Raff is by no means one of the happiest examples of the work of that too prolific master, and has certainly no claim to the place of honour in a classical programme. Madame Valleria sang with all her accustomed charm and fervour Mendelssohn's Winterlied, and fairly electrified her audience by her passionate delivery of Schumann's "Widmung." In Gounod's delicious serenade (the violin obbligato played by Mr. Carrodus), Madame Belle Cole gave great satisfaction by her artistic phrasing. Mr. Edward Lloyd made his first appearance at these concerts this season, and met with the reception justly due to a great artist.

ORGAN PEDAL PIANO.

AFFORDING PERFECTLY UNIQUE PEDAL PRACTICE.

34, Sheen Park, Richmond.

DEAR SIR,—I have deferred writing to comment upon your Pedals and Action now attached to my pianoforte until I could satisfy myself of their utility and efficiency. I can now conscientiously say that they more than fulfil all my anticipations. Although I am no carpenter, aided by your lucid diagram I had but little difficulty in attaching them myself, and it is impossible to over-estimate the comfort they give to me, or to conceive the saving of time one experiences in one's own room.—Believe me, yours truly,

To Mr. Ainsworth. BURNHAM-HORNER, F.R. Hist. S.

DEAR SIR,—It gives me great pleasure to bear testimony to the perfection of your invention. I am more than satisfied with your Patent Action and Organ Pedals, and consider them worth double the money. Organists and Organ student who desire to improve in the Art of Pedalling, which is so essential to a good organist, will do well to procure a set. I have seen no Action half so effective, and one can sit at the piano and play, "Fixed in his everlasting seat," or any other organ music or organ arrangement, with the greatest pleasure. The touch of pedals could not be better, and the action is, as you say, "Absolutely free from annoyances." They cannot be too highly recommended, as by their use, rapid progress is certain.—Believe me, sincerely yours, I. B. THORNTON,
Organist, Birstall, Leeds.

Cologne, July 16th, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have much pleasure in informing you that your Pedals have given the fullest satisfaction. I have them combined with my practice piano. Many of my musical friends who have seen them, as well as my organ pupils, are quite delighted with them; and I must acknowledge that I have never met with any Pedals so noiseless and pleasant to play upon as yours. The Action I consider durable, and of very good workmanship. Every organist who desires to perfect his playing will welcome your invention. I can recommend your goods in every respect.—Yours truly, HERR J. RODENKIRCHEN.
To John Ainsworth, Esq. Organist, The Cathedral, Cologne, Germany.

TOOLS.—In order to facilitate the attachment, a complete set of tools are sent (four in number), each one marked for its particular use. By the use of these tools, and following carefully the directions, ANY ONE can make a really good attachment.

Facts and Comments.

The prospectus of the Crystal Palace Saturday Afternoon Concerts is just published, and is full of promise and interest to the habitués of Mr. Manns' Concert Room. The first concert will take place on October 13, when the vocalist will be Mdlle. Elvira Gambogi, and the pianist, Mr. Fritz Hartvigson. The programme will include Beethoven's Symphony in C, and a "Rhapsodie" by Chabrier, which has not been previously performed in England. On December 15, Dr. Parry's "Judith" will be given; and amongst the other choral works announced, are Grieg's "At the Cloister Gate," Hamish MacCunn's "Lord Ullin's Daughter," and Berlioz's "Faust." The following instrumental works will be heard for the first time during the season; Festal Symphony in D, Henry Gadsby; Symphony No. 2, in E flat, Goldmark; Violin Concerto, B. Godard; Concert Overture, "Autumn," E. Grieg; Overture, "Twelfth-Night," and Benediction for violins and wind instruments, A. C. Mackenzie; Concert Overture, "The dowie Dens o' Yarrow," Hamish MacCunn; Suite of Dances for Strings, Schubert; "Cortège-Fantastique," Moszkowski. Altogether the season's programme is most attractive, and Mr. Manns should receive the support of all amateurs.

Madame Sophie Menter's admirers—and they are many—will rejoice to know that the accomplished lady has so far recovered her health as to be able to commence concert tours in Russia, France, and afterwards England.

More music in high places. It seems that the young Princess Lætitia Bonaparte, whose marriage with Prince Amédée of Savoy took place recently, is a singer of great merit. The distinguished amateur is a pupil of Madame Fricci, who was formerly one of the best dramatic singers in Italy.

Mdlle. Marianne Brandt, one of the leading prima donnas of Germany, and whose interpretation of Fidelio is already historic, is about to retire from the stage.

Dr. Hans von Bülow, the eccentric, has confided to his friend, Dr. Richard Pohl, that he intends to publish a pamphlet, entitled, "The New Wagnerians, painted by an Old Wagnerian." Prenez y garde, New Wagnerians!

The young American violinist who (anagrammatically) calls herself Miss Arma Senkrah, was married on the 15th inst. to a German gentleman named Hoffmann, and is said to have abandoned her artistic life altogether. Or as an old joke would put it, she has exchanged her violin for a "beau."

Another young lady violinist, Teresina Tuà, seems to be making great progress in her artistic career. She is about to give three concerts in Berlin, at which she will perform the three Concerti of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Max Bruch. Mr. Arthur Friedheim will also appear as pianist on these occasions. We would hope that Signorina Tuà will soon pay another visit to this country, for we have very pleasant recollections of her girlish performances here a few years ago.

Herr Rubinstein is engaged in preparing for the stage a new Russian opera of his composition, entitled "A Walpurgis-Night."

Composers of part-songs may draw a wholesome moral from the following story told by a German contemporary:—"Once, when the Crown Prince (afterwards the Emperor Frederick) was passing through a small Silesian town, all the choral societies of the neighbourhood assembled to do him honour. The train moved very slowly, and the Prince stood at the window saluting. The assembled choirs began a song of welcome. Twenty tenors burst out with the opening words of the hymn; the basses repeated the phrase an octave lower; the tenors struck in again, and then fifty lusty voices thundered out the theme—always to the same words. Then the Prince's countenance darkened, the features of his attendants showed signs of wrath, a signal was given, and the train moved rapidly on. Singers and public were alike confounded at this catastrophe, and no one could guess what had happened. It came out afterwards. The hymn, it appears, had been written in canonic form. The tenors had begun with 'Hang him up!' the basses had replied, 'Hang him up!' and the whole choir had repeated, 'HANG HIM UP!' when, alas, the train had moved on before the singers had had time to complete the sentence, which was:—'Hang him (it) up! the laurel wreath, in honour of our noble Prince." If this story isn't true, it deserves to be.

We understand that Mr. S. W. L. Marshall Hall's music drama "Harold," a scene of which was produced last February by Mr. Henschel, has been purchased by a well-known German theatrical agent, who is negotiating for its production at Cologne. It is surely a reproach to the apathy of English managers that a work which so plainly exhibits genuine power should not obtain a full hearing in London.

The Walter Bache Scholarship Fund is, we are glad to learn, still increasing, and the amount already subscribed reaches to nearly £450. The courage and devotion of the musician in whose memory the Scholarship at the Royal Academy is to founded, call for emphatic recognition on the part of all who can appreciate sincerity and enthusiasm in art. The subscription list, of which Mr. A. H. Littleton, 1, Berners Street, W., is the treasurer, and Mr. C. A. Barry, Gloucester Lodge, Lawrie Park, S.E., the secretary, is still open.

The "official" announcement of Mr. Basil Tree's accession to the throne made vacant by the recent abdication of Mr. Ambrose Austin, enables us to congratulate him publicly on an event which has been an open secret for at least six months. As Mr. Austin's right hand for many years, Mr. Tree has had golden opportunities of acquiring the difficult art of which Mr. Austin was so great a master—the management of the most popular concert room in Europe. The difficulties of such a position can hardly be comprehended by the outside public. Tact of a high order, wide acquaintance with men and things, inexhaustible patience and constant vigilance, are a few of the qualities needed, and we do not doubt that they are possessed by Mr. Tree.

From the following extract:—

—the beginning of a tune in an old collection of "Meister-Tönen" (Master Tunes) used at Nurenburg, made by Wagenseil, is shown the source whence Wagner obtained one of his themes in the Meistersinger. It is the first of the four crowned tones (gekrönten Tönen) of the "Meisterlichen Hortes" in which the suing of Jacob for the hand of Rachel is related in a very circumstantial manner. This fact has been noticed in an article entitled "Von der Meistersinger holdseligen Kunst" by Otto Lessmann published in the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Zeitung. Wagner's theme is as follows:—

The programme of the works to be performed during the approaching season by Novello's Choir is in many ways of considerable interest. It includes Dr. Parry's "Judith," Hamish MacCunn's "Lord Ullin's Daughter," Dr. Mackenzie's new Liverpool cantata, "The Dream of Jubal," and "The Light of Asia," by the American composer, Dudley Buck, the introduction of the last-named work being a welcome sign of catholicity. Beethoven, Bach, and Wagner are totally unrepresented, but—is it to compensate for this lack?—the "Elijah" and "Messiah" will be given. Dr. Mackenzie will conduct at all the concerts.

THE CHARITY CONCERT.

After an interval of a few minutes, a short fat gentleman, in a black coat and white tie, advanced to the footlights, bowed gracefully, and drew from his pocket three or four pieces of box-wood; then, having fitted them one to another, he announced that, with the aid of this trifling instrument, he was going to imitate the notes of every bird, from the song of the nightingale to the croaking of the crow. At these words, a murmur of satisfaction and approval ran through the assembly, succeeded almost at once by a profound and religious silence. This short fat gentleman was the flageolet-player of Tarascon.

He imitated first the warbling of the nightingale, then, successively, the chirping of the titmouse and the black-cap, the whistling of the throstle, the hooting of the owl, the cooing of the dove, the clucking of the hen, the shrill crow of the cock, and, as he had promised, the croaking of the crow. This flageolet was at once an aviary and a farm-yard. After an hour of this agreeable exercise, which seemed greatly to the taste of the public of Carpentras, the gentleman took his precious instrument to pieces again, thrust it into his pocket, and withdrew amidst the plaudits of the crowd. My neighbour on the right, who could not believe in the wonders he had heard, assured me that the birds had been hidden in the wings. My neighbour on the left, a pleasant and witty fellow, was of opinion that the performer ought to send his flageolet to M. Dupont, the naturalist, to have it stuffed.

The short fat gentleman was succeeded by one who was long and thin. This was he of Avignon. He announced that with the aid of a simple violin he was going to imitate all the instruments, from the flute to the drum, which he proceeded to do, with the best intentions in the world. He did play every instrument except the violin. Thinking over it, I said to myself later that he was one of the many artists in whom the talent of assimilation has killed individuality, who are capable of reproducing all except their own natures, and are echoes of all but themselves.

To the long thin gentleman succeeded a third, long haired, bearded, curled, perfumed, elaborately got up, with canary coloured gloves, cuffs turned up over his wrists; a beau, a dandy—the "lion" had not been invented then. He had the figure of a drum-major, with hands strong enough to kill an ox at a blow, and shoulders to excite the jealousy of Hercules. He sat down at the piano, and began to sing "Fleuve du Tage," in an amorous voice which ravished us all. Since then I have always professed a profound admiration for the youthful valour which can so charm our evenings. To go into the field, to meet without blanching the adversary's fire, to take one's place bravely in the battle array, to charge the foe with unfaltering foot, to march to death without fear—there is nothing in all this to astonish me. But, in the presence of two or three hundred people, to seat oneself before a piano, and to sing in one's beard, "Je vais revoir ma Normandie," or any other similar lamentation, that is the highest pitch of heroism which a man can attain. Men like this have proved their courage, and are quite within their rights to refuse a duel. Women share my opinion on this point, and as in general they love heroes, it is very seldom a singer of romances does not carry the day with them against a man of intelligence.

Still, however, the Countess did not arrive. It was close upon ten o'clock; one could hardly expect her any longer. All the same, we waited, we hoped still, when a fourth gentleman, he of Carpentras, the leader of the band and organiser of the affair, advanced to the footlights, and after making three bows, communicated to the assembly a letter which he had but that instant received. It was a charming little note, in which Madame de R—— excused herself for her inability appear at the concert, and begged the committee to accept her offering with her regrets. The letter was accompanied by a note for a thousand francs.

You can guess what a cruel disappointment this was for the curious, the fools, and the mischief-makers. There was a general hubbub, a tremendous outcry. What was not said? What did I not hear? It was quite evident that the countess was old and ugly, since she refused to shew herself; that she had lost her voice, since she would not let herself be heard. But it was the sending of the note for a thousand francs which above all stirred up the wrath of these ingenuous people. It was, truly, a fitting thing for a street-singer to put on these airs of a princess! Had the poor of Carpentras need of the munificence of the Castle? Was not the town able to support its poor? They advised that the note should immediately be sent back to the haughty donor. At the same time, as the largest part of the audience had paid only to see the countess, and hear her sing, there came from all parts of the room the voices of people who proclaimed that they were robbed, and loudly demanded the return of their money; so that, at this concert given in aid of the poor, the poor ran great risk of deriving from it no other good than the advantage of not having been present. The storm was increasing, the exasperation was at its height. Vainly, to allay the loosened passions and to drown the noise of the tempest, the orchestra attacked the overture to "Lodoïska" with uncommon vigour; the tempest drowned the noise of the orchestra. It has chanced to me, since that memorable evening, to be present at many concerts, but I do not remember ever to have heard such an uproar. They whistled, they howled; some half-dozen dogs, who had followed their masters, began to utter plaintive whines, to which the mischievous wags responded with doleful cat-calls. The children squalled, the women cried, they threatened to throw the benches about, and in the midst of the tempest, the overture to "Lodoïska" still kept on its way; the Tartars were in the hall.

It was difficult to foresee how the scene of confusion and tumult would end, when suddenly the angry waves fell back silent and motionless, as if the finger of God had bidden them to peace and stillness.

A young stranger, whom no one had noticed amidst the general disturbance, had lightly cleared the space between the stage and the auditorium, and suddenly we saw her seated before the piano intended for Madame de R——, like an angel descended out of heaven. And was she not an angel indeed? She had scarcely reached the first days of youth, the simple graces of childhood still smiled on her charming face; but the fire of genius already shone in her brow and glances. She was simple and grave, without embarrassment or boldness, with a half smile on her lips. At this apparition, silence fell on all. Who was this woman? No one could say. All eyes were fixed on her! calm, serene, she scarcely seemed to see the crowd watching her. She untied the ribbons of a white hood, which she dropped carelessly at her feet. Her head-dress was low; her hair, parted on the forehead, fell along her temples, lustrous and black like a raven's wing. She drew off her gloves, and her little hands ran over the key-board. Then having preluded for a few moments, the young stranger sang.

MR. HAMISH MacCUNN'S NEW CANTATA.

Mr. Hamish MacCunn has, in his latest work, "Bonny Kilmeny," followed the lines which he has already laid down for himself, leading to the musical expression of the best and highest characteristics of the Scottish literature and national emotion. The Ettrick Shepherd's sweet fairy-tale, it is needless to point out, does not lend itself to dramatic treatment; and since it was in "programme music" of a highly dramatic sort that Mr. MacCunn has chiefly distinguished himself hitherto, and his friends were not a little curious to see how he would adapt his methods to the dreamy mysticism of "Bonny Kilmeny." It would be premature to attempt anything like a detailed analysis of a work which has not as yet been performed, but it may safely be asserted that Mr. MacCunn has every reason to be proud of his latest composition. The work opens with a simple chorus of female voices, "Bonny Kilmeny went up the glen." This is followed by a charming tenor solo, "Her brow was like the lily flower." The first mystic note is struck in the chorus, "In yonde greenwood there is a waike," the accompaniment being particularly suited to the grisly suggestion of the words. To the tenor is allotted the solo which tells how "Bonny Kilmeny fell sound asleep," a flowing number succeeded by a dreamy passage in F sharp, founded on the leading phrase of the opening chorus, and admirably prelusive of the exquisite chorus of spirits, "Oh blest be the day Kilmeny was born." This is followed by a baritone solo, "Long have I searched the world wide," of which the accompaniment is the most original part, and the first half of the work is completed by a tenor solo, "They claspit her waist and hands so fair," and chorus, "Now shall the land of spirits see." The second half commences with a baritone solo of much beauty, describing how "Kilmeny came hame" after her seven years' sojourn in the land of dreams. Very effective, too, are the chorus, "Kilmeny, Kilmeny, O where have ye been," and the modulations introducing the baritone solo, "Kilmeny looked up with a lovely grace." One of the most beautiful numbers in the work, however, is certainly the soprano solo, "I have come from the land of love and light," in which the spiritual mysticism of the story finds perfect expression. The cantata is, or ought to be, finished by the baritone solo, which tells how, "when a month and a day had come and gone," Kilmeny once more sought the "greenwood wene," and "returned to the land of thought again." If Mr. MacCunn had been well advised he would have finished his work here. He has, however, appended as an epilogue a chorus, of which the words are supplied by Dr. Moir's poem, "Weep not for her"—which strikes an entirely false note. In sentiment it is utterly alien to the whole purpose of the preceding work, and the last impression is therefore incongruous and ineffective. The exquisite tale of faery needed no such moral, and we trust that Mr. MacCunn may be wise enough to dispense with it. With this exception, the work is one of exceeding beauty, and we shall look forward with interest to its performance.

The second volume treats somewhat lengthily of the struggles between rival operatic companies in America; followed by interesting information respecting the Musical Protective Union, orchestras in America, &c. After several more or less funny stories about Madame Patti, her journeys, and her successes, Colonel Mapleson proceeds to say "the public has but little idea of the difficulties by which the career of an opera manager is surrounded. An ordinary theatrical manager brings out some trivial operetta which, thanks in a great measure to scenery, upholstery, costumes, and a liberal display of the female form divine, catches the taste of the public. The piece runs for hundreds of nights without a change in the bill, the singers appearing night after night in the same parts. The maladie de larynx, the extinction de voix, of which leading opera singers are sure now and then, with or without reason, to complain, are unknown to these honest vocalists; and if, by chance, one of them does fall ill there is always a substitute, known as the 'understudy.'" Again, "What would one give for a Prima Donna who, like Miss Ellen Terry or Mrs. Kendal, would be ready to play every night? or for a public who, like audiences at the St. James's Theatre and the Lyceum, would go night after night for an indefinite time to see the same piece?" Colonel Mapleson is evidently dreaming of a musically educated public who would care just a little for the operas, instead of wrangling about the superiority of a Patti, an Albani, or a Gerster. And he forgets the old fogies who back up the merits of artists who retired some fifty years ago and whom the present generation cannot have heard at all? Ask any one of these highly respectable authorities anything about the melodic, rhythmic, or orchestral features of the operas which threw them into such raptures in their youthful days, and what answers will you get? Little beyond the reiterated names of the long-ago famous artists. In view of the dilemmas brought about by the wilfulness and caprices of prime donne, the impresario, one would think, must often sigh for the days of the ancient Greeks who, in their theatres, dispensed with ladies altogether.

Still, the public will be pleased to learn how highly some refined artists are esteemed by their operatic managers, and the tender manner in which Madlle. Chapuy's singing and her somewhat romantic marriage are described, proves that poetic feeling exists "off" as well as "on" the stage.

Detailed accounts of the building (not forgetting the cost) of the Opera House on the Thames Embankment will doubtless prove interesting to many readers, while others will be attracted by Colonel Mapleson's description of his first visit to America "in that unsteady vessel known amongst nautical men as the Jumping Java." To those who care for a peep at royal manners, the visit of Colonel Mapleson to the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh at Eastwell Park will be a revelation. To musicians, however, the account given of the Duchess of Edinburgh sitting absorbed on the floor of her box during a performance of Fidelio perusing a huge score, and of her keen detection of an uncertain note from the second horn, will be more pleasant reading.

We cannot resist quoting the following about Signor Campanini. "One evening, about nine o'clock, the hall-keeper brought me word that there was 'some one from Campini, some such name.' I immediately brightened up and said 'send the messenger in,' who accordingly entered. He had a coloured flannel shirt on, no shirt collar, a beard of two or three days' growth, and a little pot hat. He, in fact, looked rather a rough customer. In reply to my interrogation, he informed me that Campanini had arrived and was in London. I replied 'are you sure?' Thereupon he burst out laughing, and said that 'he was Campanini.' I felt as if I should go through the floor."

Of another famous tenor it is stated, "about this time the strange idea occurred to him of endeavouring to master the meaning of the parts entrusted to him in the various operas. 'In Medea' he innocently remarked: 'during the last two years I have played the part of a man named "Jason;"' but what he has to do with 'Medea' I have never been able to make out. Am I her father, her lover, or what?"

THE "DON GIOVANNI" OF GAZZANIGA AND OF MOZART.

In the last number of the "Musikwissenschaft," edited by Friedrich Chrysander, Philipp Spitta and Guido Adler, there is a most valuable and interesting article on the Don Giovanni operas of Gazzaniga and of Mozart.

The Spanish story of "Don Juan" dramatised by Tirso de Molina soon passed into Italy; the "Giliberti" version appeared in 1652. Then Molière wrote his "Don Juan, ou le Festin de Pierre" for the Palais Royal Theatre in 1665. Goldoni treated the same subject in 1736; and at Vienna in 1769 there was a pantomine ballet called "Don Juan." Now ten years before Mozart's opera appeared, an opera "Don Giovanni" by V. Righini was produced in Vienna. After describing the plot of this work, Jahn, the biographer of Mozart, goes on to speak of an opera "Il Convitato di Pietra" by G. Gazzaniga, given, with much success, at Venice in 1789. "The libretto is lost," says Jahn, "but fragments of a score which Sonnleithner discovered in Vienna show that Da Ponte must have made liberal use of this libretto, if indeed the two have not a common source."

About twenty years ago Chrysander picked up in London a score of this opera, and afterwards obtained a copy of the same work from a manuscript in Vienna, the one just mentioned. Each of these copies, however, was incomplete. Lately he obtained copies of some numbers from a score of the opera in the possession of the Ricordi firm at Milan; but still there were gaps.

At last he got hold of a small book published at Venice, the libretto of "Il Capriccio Dramatico," written by Giovanni Bertati. In this "Capriccio" a certain director, Policastro, announces to his company that all the pieces he has given have failed, and that he intends to produce "Don Giovanni, or the Stone Guest." The members of the company make all sorts of objections; but at length, by threat of not paying salaries, Policastro overcomes them. Then the piece is played. So that the "Capriccio" is a sort of prelude to the "Don Giovanni," which consists of one act only. Chrysander gives the Italian text of both parts.

The opera was produced in Italy in 1787. It was given at Venice, Varese, Rome, and other places with great success. Goethe must have seen it in the last mentioned city in 1788, for in one of his letters, describing a night walk through Rome, he says that the statue of Marcus Aurelius brought to his mind the commendatore in "Don Juan." It came out in Paris in 1791, and for the performance Cherubini wrote a quartet "Non ti fidar o misera."

A Capriccio and "Don Giovanni" were performed in London at the Haymarket Theatre on March 1, 1794. At that time Da Ponte, Mozart's librettist, was poet to this theatre. He had tried, but in vain, to have Mozart's opera accepted. At the Haymarket, the composers named were Cimarosa (for the capriccio), Gazzaniga, and Guglielmi. The Capriccio was not the "Bertati," but one written in 1781 for which Cimarosa had provided music. A second performance, with many changes, took place a week later. Leporello's "Register" aria from Mozart's opera was actually introduced, but without any mention of the composer. "A proof," says Chrysander, "that Mozart as a writer of operas had not yet acquired European fame."

Da Ponte revised Bertati's libretto, for the London text-book stated that "the words are new, by L. Da Ponte, poet of this theatre, except those that are not marked with inverted commas."

Now with respect to the original libretto of Bertati and the music of Gazzaniga, Chrysander asserts that both made their way to Vienna early in February 1787, and further that Mozart and Da Ponte took this "Venetian product" as the groundwork of the new opera which they were preparing.

Da Ponte in his autobiography says, that with the help of Tokayer, tobacco and the sweet smiles of his housekeeper's pretty daughter, he wrote off the first two scenes of Don Juan, besides portions of the librettos which he was preparing for the composers Salieri and Martini, in one day. Chrysander considers, however, that this rapid writing was not so much due to the "helps" mentioned by Da Ponte, as to the fact that he had Bertati's text before him. The situations in both books are the same. It was only at the third scene that changes had to be effected. Some of the rôles in Bertati had to be got rid of in order to suit the number of singers (seven), which were available at Prague and also Vienna.

Donna Anna in Bertati retires into a cloister after the death of her father, and does not appear again. Notice, says Chrysander, how in Mozart's opera, she is an important personage at the beginning, but afterwards her entries have somewhat of an episodical character. In various other ways, he tries to show how one can trace the "Da Ponte" re-arrangement.

Why, asks Chrysander, was Da Ponte so silent about Bertati? Why did he not acknowledge how much he was indebted to him? Personal hatred seems to have been the cause. After the death of the Emperor Joseph II, Bertati was named court poet in place of Da Ponte. The latter paid the former a visit, and in his own garrulous style he has described the interview. It is quite evident that Da Ponte is—for some reason—trying to make Bertati small and ridiculous. "When I announced my name," he says "Bertati appeared thunderstruck, and with the greatest perplexity and confusion asked in what he could be of service to me." Again he tells us that on the table he saw a volume of French comedies, a dictionary, a book of rhymes, and a Corticulli grammar, thus trying to make Bertati not a real poet, but a hack-verse maker. Da Ponte asks for a copy of his own opera libretti that he might take them away with him from Vienna. Bertati answers scornfully—this is of course Da Ponte's account—that he has nothing whatever to do with them.

Chrysander, in a second attack, will enter still further into the subject, and he announces that there will be many musical illustrations. Is he, perchance, going to show that as Da Ponte to Bertati, so Mozart was indebted to his predecessor, Gazzanigi?

REVIEWS.

Messrs. Metzler & Co. send the first three numbers of the Red Album, a series of shilling books which, even in these days of cheap music, merits special mention. For half the usual price given for one song or piece, eight or nine are thus obtainable. Nos. 1 and 2 contain songs by Cowen, Pinsuti, Sullivan, etc.; No. 3 includes eight effective and pleasing pianoforte pieces, the best of which are Blumenthal's "Les Mariniers"; a nocturne by Cowen; "The Fairies, Greeting," by Bucalossi," and "In a Swing," by Cotsford Dick.

Messrs. Hutchings & Co. send several songs. "The Minster City," by Annie E. Armstrong, is an appropriate musical setting of rather hymn-like verses. "I am tired," "a musical recitation," by Richard Harvey, is likely to induce the listener to repeat the title on his own account. The same composer's "Old Time and the Maiden," is simple but not very striking. "The Love Watch," serenade, by C. Richard Duggan, might be made effective by a good singer, but we fear the illustration of the patient pot-hatted lover on the title page will so frighten intending purchasers that they will look no further. In "Laughing," by Cecil Treherne, a very slender frame-work affords admirable opportunities for a demonstrative singer. We understand this song has already been made popular by Mr. James Sauvage. "All I Ask," by J. L Roeckel is of a somewhat hackneyed type. "My Bonnie Fisher Lad," by Cleveland Wigan, is also cast in a well-worn mould. "Hush thy sweet sounds, oh River," by W. H. Cummings (a song with ad. lib. accompaniment for Violin or Violoncello) is, though simple in melody, written with musicianly care and tact. Henry Smart's vocal duet "A place for summer dreaming" is interesting and refined. Four numbers of a set of fourteen original choruses for use in public schools, composed by H. F. Henniker, A.R.A.M., may be safely recommended. No. 2 ("Sweet and Low") is particularly charming and will repay careful practice.

CALLIRHOË.

A Dramatic Cantata,

MUSIC BY

J. FREDERICK BRIDGE, Mus. Doc.

Composed expressly for the

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL, 1888.

PRICE IN PAPER COVER, 2s. 6d.

VOCAL PARTS EACH 1s.

London: Novello, Ewer, & Co.,

Press Opinions:—

The success of Dr. Bridge's cantata is beyond dispute, and we shall probably hear much of it during the approaching season.—Daily Telegraph.

Callirhoë brings to light a native composer who has fancy and originality, in addition to thorough knowledge of the technical means by which these inestimable gifts are calculated to yield artistic benefit.—Chronicle.

Dr. Bridge's new composition will take high rank among his works for he has written it with much knowledge of vocal and instrumental effect, and no small graphic delineation.—Guardian.

Melodic charm and modern harmonic effect—the solos for the soprano are exceptionally pleasing.—Musical World.

Dr. Bridge is anything but a Wagnerite, but he has escaped the shadow of the cloisters in all this exciting music, which is perfectly modern in its free development and display of passion.—Standard.

The work is one in which the Westminster Abbey organist should be proud.—Figaro.

There can be little doubt that his new cantata will ere long become popular in all parts of the country.—Globe.

It ought to take very high rank among the popular cantatas of the modern repertory. In the provinces and among ordinary choral societies there is little doubt that Callirhoë will be in immediate demand, not only becuse the choral work is so sympathetic and effective, but also because it really needs the engagement of only two artists out of the usual quartet, the contralto having very little, the baritone nothing to do.—Daily News.

Will doubtless find a speedy welcome among choral societies.—Morning Post.

May be strongly recommended to the notice of choral societies as certain to interest them and their audiences.—Athenæum.
